Jarndyce and Jarndyce drones on. This scarecrow of a suit has, in course of time, become so complicated that no man alive knows what it means. The parties to it understand it least, but it has been observed that no two Chancery lawyers can talk about it for five minutes without coming to a total disagreement as to all the premises. Innumerable children have been born into the cause; innumerable young people have married into it; innumerable old people have died out of it. Scores of persons have deliriously found themselves made parties in Jarndyce and Jarndyce without knowing how or why; whole families have inherited legendary hatreds with the suit. The little plaintiff or defendant who was promised a new rocking-horse when Jarndyce and Jarndyce should be settled has grown up, possessed himself of a real horse, and trotted away into the other world. Fair wards of court have faded into mothers and grandmothers; a long procession of Chancellors has come in and gone out; the legion of bills in the suit have been transformed into mere bills of mortality; there are not three Jarndyces left upon the earth perhaps since old Tom Jarndyce in despair blew his brains out at a coffee-house in Chancery Lane; but Jarndyce and Jarndyce still drags its dreary length before the court, perennially hopeless.

Chapter 1

Introduction

1. The Judicial System

1.1 Federal Courts

U.S. Constitution, Art. III, sec. 1

The judicial power of the United States, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, Understanding the Federal Courts (n.d.)

Structure of the Federal Courts

The Supreme Court is the highest court in the United States. Article III of the U.S. Constitution created the Supreme Court and authorized Congress to pass laws establishing a system of lower courts. In the federal court system's present form, 94 district-level trial courts and 13 courts of appeals sit below the Supreme Court.

Trial Courts

The U.S. district courts are the primary trial courts of the federal court system. Within limits set by Congress and the Constitution, the district courts have jurisdiction to hear nearly all categories of federal cases, including both civil and criminal matters. There are 94 federal judicial districts, including at least one district in each state, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. Each district includes a U.S. bankruptcy court as a unit of the district court.

There are two special trial courts that have nationwide jurisdiction over certain types of cases. The Court of International Trade addresses cases involving international trade issues. The United States Court of Federal Claims has jurisdiction over most claims for damages against the United States, disputes over federal contracts, unlawful “taking” of property by the federal government, vaccine injury cases, and a variety of other cases involving the United States.

Three territories of the United States—the Virgin Islands, Guam, and the Northern Mariana Islands—have U.S. district courts that hear federal cases, including bankruptcy cases.

Appellate Courts

The 94 judicial districts are organized into 12 regional circuits, each of which has a court of appeals. A court of appeals hears challenges to district court decisions located within its circuit, as well as appeals from decisions of federal administrative agencies. In addition, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has nationwide jurisdiction over appeals in specialized cases, such as those involving patent laws and cases decided by the Court of International Trade and the Court of Federal Claims.

United States Supreme Court

The U.S. Supreme Court consists of the Chief Justice of the United States and eight associate justices. At its discretion, and within certain guidelines established by Congress, the Court hears a small percentage of the cases it is asked to decide each year. Supreme Court justices are usually selected either because the lower courts have differed, or “split,” on a case, or they involve important questions about the Constitution or federal law.

Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts

Before a federal court can hear a case, or “exercise its jurisdiction,” certain conditions must be met.

First, under the Constitution, federal courts exercise only “judicial” powers. This means that federal judges may interpret the law only through the resolution of actual legal disputes, referred to in Article III of the Constitution as “Cases or Controversies.” A court cannot attempt to correct a problem on its own initiative, or to answer a hypothetical legal question.

Second, in an actual case or controversy, the plaintiff in a federal lawsuit also must have legal “standing” to ask the court for a decision. That means the plaintiff must have been aggrieved, or legally harmed in some way, by the defendant.

Third, the case must present a category of dispute that the law in question was designed to address, and it must be a complaint that the court has the power to remedy. In other words, the court must be authorized, under the Constitution or a federal law, to hear the case and grant appropriate relief to the plaintiff.

Finally, the case cannot be “moot,” that is, it must present an ongoing problem for the court to resolve. The federal courts, thus, are courts of “limited” jurisdiction because they may only decide certain types of cases as provided by Congress or as identified in the Constitution.

Although the details of the complex web of federal jurisdiction that Congress has given the federal courts is beyond the scope of this brief guide, it is important to understand that there are two main sources of the cases coming before the federal courts: “federal question” jurisdiction and “diversity” jurisdiction.

In general, federal question jurisdiction arises in cases that involve the U.S. government, the U.S. Constitution or federal laws, or controversies between states or between the United States and foreign governments. A case that raises such a “federal question” may be filed in federal court. Examples of such cases might include a claim by an individual for entitlement to money under a federal government program such as Social Security, a criminal prosecution by the government that alleges someone violated a federal law, or a challenge to actions taken by a federal agency.

A case also may be filed in federal court based on the “diversity of citizenship” of the litigants, such as between citizens of different states, or between U.S. citizens and those of another country. To ensure fairness to the out-of-state litigant, the Constitution provides that such cases may be heard in a federal court. An important limit to diversity jurisdiction is that only cases involving more than $75,000 in potential damages may be filed in a federal court. Claims below that amount may only be pursued in state court. Moreover, any diversity jurisdiction case regardless of the amount of money involved may be brought in a state court rather than a federal court.

Federal courts also have jurisdiction over all bankruptcy matters, which can be determined should be addressed in federal courts rather than the state courts. In the bankruptcy process, individuals or businesses that can no longer pay their creditors may seek a court-supervised liquidation of their assets, or they may reorganize their financial affairs and work out a plan to pay their debts.

Although federal courts are located in every state, they are not the only forums available to potential litigants. In fact, the great majority of legal disputes in American communities, both criminal and civil, are addressed in the separate state court systems. State courts have jurisdiction over virtually all divorce and child custody matters, probate and inheritance issues, real estate questions, and juvenile matters, and they handle most criminal cases, contract disputes, patent violations, and personal injury cases. In addition, certain categories of legal disputes are resolved in special courts or entities that are part of the federal executive or legislative branch or state and federal administrative agencies.

1.2 State Courts

Each state, as well as the District of Columbia and territories such as Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, has its own judicial system. These are also organized into trial and appellate levels, though the structures vary somewhat.

Structure of State Courts

Trial Courts

State trial courts go by a variety of names: Superior Court (Alaska, Arizona, California, Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Georgia, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Washington), Circuit Court (Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia, Wisconsin), District Court (Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Minnesota, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Texas, and Utah), Court of Common Pleas (Pennsylvania), or Supreme Court (New York).

Appellate Courts

Most states also have at least one intermediate appellate court, usually called Court of Appeals (exceptions include the Superior Court, Appellate Division in New Jersey, Court of Appeals in Maryland, Court of Appeals in New York, and the Superior and Commonwealth Courts in Pennsylvania). In some states (Arizona, California, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Tennessee, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin), the intermediate court is divided into geographic districts, similar to the federal appellate circuits. (Delaware, Maine, Montana, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Vermont, Virginia, and Wyoming) have no intermediate appellate court. Alabama and Tennessee do not have an intermediate appellate court.

separate intermediate appellate courts for civil and criminal cases. Pennsylvania has a special intermediate appellate court (the Commonwealth Court) with jurisdiction over certain civil cases involving state and local government, and another (the Superior Court) for other civil appeals and all criminal appeals.

The highest court in each state is usually called the Supreme Court, though some states use other names (e.g. Supreme Judicial Court in Massachusetts and Maine; Supreme Court of Appeals in West Virginia; Court of Appeals in New York, Maryland, and the District of Columbia). Texas and Oklahoma each have two courts of last resort: a Supreme Court for civil cases and a Court of Criminal Appeals for criminal cases.

Jurisdiction of State Courts

Unlike the federal courts, which have limited subject matter jurisdiction, state courts have plenary jurisdiction, meaning they have the power to hear almost any type of case, regardless of the law under which the claims arise, the citizenship of the parties, or the amount in controversy. The main exception involves cases over which federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction, such as suits under federal patent law, antitrust law, and labor law.

Within state judicial systems, original jurisdiction over certain types of cases is sometimes allocated to particular courts. Many states have special trial courts for family law, probate, or other matters. A few states (Delaware, Mississippi, and Tennessee) have separate Chancery courts to hear suits in equity. Most states also have lower courts for suits involving claims below a specified dollar value (e.g. District Court in North Carolina).

2. Civil Litigation

2.1 Turning Disputes into Lawsuits

William L.F. Felstiner, Richard L. Abel, & Austin Sarat, “The Emergence & Transformation of Disputes: Naming, Blaming, Claiming ...”, 15 Law & Society Review 631 (1980)

I. Introduction

The sociology of law has been dominated by studies of officials and formal institutions and their work products. This agenda has shaped the way disputes are understood and resolved. Institutions reify cases by reducing them to records; they embody disputes in a context that can be studied retrospectively by attending to the words used by lay persons and by examining the economic and legal context in which cases occur. But disputes are not things: they are social constructs. Their shapes reflect whatever definition the disputants give to the concept. Moreover, a significant portion of any dispute exists only in the minds of the disputants.

II. Where Disputes Come From and How They Develop

Assume a population living downwind from a nuclear test site. Some portion of the population has developed cancer as a result of the exposure and some has not. Some of those who have cancer know that they are sick and some do not. In order for disputes to emerge and resolve conflicts to be taken, an unperceived injurious experience (unPIE, for short) must be transformed into a perceived injurious experience (PIE). The uninformed cancer victims must learn that they are sick. The transformation perspective directs our attention to the differential transformation of unPIEs into PIEs. It urges us to examine, in this case, differences in class, education, occupation, family situation, social networks, etc. between those who become aware of their cancer and those who do not, as well as attend to the possible manipulation of information by those responsible for the radiation.

This first transformation—saying to oneself that a particular experience is injurious—we call naming. Though hard to study empirically, naming may be the most important transformation; the level and kind of disputing in a society may turn more on what is perceived as an injury than on any later decision. For instance, asbestosis only became an acknowledged “disease” and the basis of a claim for compensation when shipyard workers stopped taking for granted that they would have trouble breathing after ten years of working with insulation and came to view their condition as a problem.

The next step is the transformation of a perceived injurious experience into a grievance. This occurs when a person attributes an injury to the fault of another individual or social group. By including fault within the definition of grievance, we limit the concept to injuries that are seen as violations of norms and as remediable. The definition takes the grievant’s perception that the injured person must feel wronged and believe that something might be done in response to the injury, however politically or sociologically improbable such a response might be. Blaming must be distinguished from a complaint against no one in particular (about the weather, perhaps inflation) and from a mere wish unaccompanied by a sense of injury for whom someone is held responsible (I might like to be more attractive). We call the transformation from perceived injurious experience to grievance blaming: our diseased shipyard worker blames his employer for the transformation when he holds his employer or the manufacturer of asbestos responsible for his asbestosis.

The third transformation occurs when someone with a grievance voices it to the person or entity believed to be responsible and asks for some remedy. We call this communication claiming. A claim is transformed into a dispute when it is rejected in whole or in part. Rejection need not be expressed by words. Delay that the claimant construes as resistance is just as much a rejection as is a compromise offer (partial rejection) or an outright refusal.

We know that only a small fraction of injurious experiences ever mature into disputes. Furthermore, we know that most of the attrition occurs at the early stages: experiences are not perceived as injurious; perceptions do not ripen into grievances; grievances are voiced to intimates but not to the person deemed responsible.

The early stages of naming, blaming, and claiming are significant, not only because of the high attrition they reflect, but also because the range of behavior they encompass is greater than that involved in the later stages of disputes, where institutional patterns restrict the options open to disputants. Examination of this behavior will help us identify the social structure of disputing. Transformations reflect social structural variables, as well as personality traits. People do—or do not—perceive an experience as an injury, blame someone else, claim redress, or get their claims accepted because of their social position as well as their individual characteristics. The transformation perspective points as much to the study of social stratification as to the exploration of social psychology.

III. The Characteristics of Transformation

PIEs, grievances, and disputes have the following characteristics: they are subjective, unstable, reactive, complicated, and incomplete. They are subjective in the sense that transformations need not be accompanied by any observable behavior. A disputant discusses his problem with a lawyer and consequently reappraises the behavior of the opposing party. The disputant now believes that his opponent was not just mistaken but acted in bad faith. The content of the dispute has been transformed in the mind of the disputant, although neither the lawyer nor the opposing party necessarily knows about the shift.

Since transformations may be nothing more than changes in feelings, and feelings may change repeatedly, the process is unstable. This characteristic is notable only because it differs so markedly from the conventional understanding of legal controversies. In the conventional view of disputes, the sources of claims and rejections are objective events that happened in the past. It is accepted that it may be difficult to get the facts straight, but there is rarely an awareness that the events themselves may be transformed as they are processed. This view is psychologically naive: it is insensitive to the effect of feelings on the attribution of motive and to the consequences of such attributions for the subject's understanding of behavior.

Even in ordinary understanding, disputing is a complicated process involving ambiguous behavior, faulty recall, uncertain norms, conflicting objectives, inconsistent values, and complex institutions. It is complicated still further by attention to changes in disputant feelings and objectives over time. Take the stereotypical case of personal injury arising out of an automobile accident. A conventional analysis (e.g., the one often borrowed from economics) assumes that the goals of the defendant driver are to minimize his responsibility and limit the complainant's recovery. A transformation view, on the other hand, suggests that the defendant's objectives may be both less clear and less stable. Depending on his insurance position, his own self-interest, his empathy for, relationship to, and interaction with the injured person, and discussions he may have with others about the accident and its aftermath, the defendant at various times wish to maximize rather than minimize both his own fault and the costs of recovery or to take some intermediate position. A transformation approach would identify these activities and their effects in order to account for such shifts in objective reality.

IV. Subjects and Agents of Transformation

One way to organize the study of the transformations of PIEs, grievances, and disputes is to identify what is being transformed (the subjects of transformation) and who is transforming (the agents of transformation).

Parties

Neither the identity nor the number of parties is fixed. New information about and interpretation of a conflict can lead a party to change his views about appropriate adversaries or define the conflict differently. Both may also be changed by officials of dispute processing agencies. The new parties, if they are groups like the NAACP, ACLU, or Sierra Club, may adopt a lawsuit as part of their strategy to use the courts as a mechanism of social change or to mobilize political activity, although political movements may also lose momentum as a collective struggle is transferred to an individual lawsuit. Parties may be dropped as well as added. A grievance that was experienced collectively may be individualized in the process of becoming a dispute, as in the case of labor disputes as examples.

Obviously, the parties to a conflict are central agents, as well as objects, in the transformation process. Their behavior will be a function of personality as it interacts with prior experience and current pressures. Experience includes involvement in other conflicts; contact with other groups, involvement representatives, and officials; and familiarity with various forms of dispute processing and remedies. For instance, among the newly enrolled members of a health services plan, those who have previously consulted a lawyer are more likely to use legal membership privileges than are those who have not. Personality variables that affect transformations include risk preferences, contentiousness, and feelings about personal privacy, independence, and attachment to justice (rule-mindedness). Both experience and personality are in turn related to social structural variables: class, ethnicity, gender, and age.

The relationship between the parties also has significance for transformations: the nature of the social life that brings them together (work, residence, politics, recreation)—which may affect the cost of exit—their relative status, and the history of prior conflict shape the way in which they will conduct their dispute. In addition, strategic interaction between the parties during the course of a conflict may have a major transformational role. An unusual example is the seller who seeks proactively to elicit grievances against himself: the retail seller who asks the customer to about complaints, the employer who provides an anonymous suggestion box, even the neurotic spouse or lover who invites recriminations. But more common are the new elements disputes take on, the rise and fall in animosity and effort that occurs in response to or in anticipation of the “moves” of the opposition.

Attributions

Attribution theory asserts that the causes a person assigns for an injurious experience will be important determinants of the action he or she takes in response to it; those attributions will also presumably affect perception of the experience as injurious. People who blame themselves for an experience are less likely to see it as injurious, or, having so perceived it, to voice a grievance about it; they are more likely to do both if blame can be placed upon another, particularly when the responsible agent can be seen as intentionally causing or aggravating the problem. But attributions themselves are not fixed. As moral coloration is modified by new information, logic, insight, or experience, attributions are changed, and they alter the participants' understanding of their experience. Adversary response may be an important factor in this transformation, as may the nature of the dispute process. Some processes, such as counseling, may drain the dispute of moral content and for problems; others, like direct diffuse responsibility confrontation or litigation, may intensify the disputant's moral judgment and focus blame. Thus the degree and quality of blame, an important subject of transformations, also produces further transformations.

Scope

The scope of conflict—the extent of relevant discourse about grievances and claims—is affected both by the objectives and by the processual and behavior of disputants characteristics of dispute institutions. A hypothetical case frequently used in mediator training involves a man's wife and his lover. The wife has hit the lover with a rock, and the latter has complained to the police; at arraignment the judge has referred the women to mediation. The discussion there focuses initially on the rock incident and then expands to include the battle for the man's affections. The scope of this dispute is thus complicated by the confrontation between the women during the rock incident, narrowed to that incident alone as the dispute is handled by police and court, and then broadened to re-embrace the original conflict plus the rock incident through interaction between the disputants and the mediator. Some types of dispute processing seek to narrow the disputes with which they deal in order to produce a construction of events that appears manageable. Others are alive to context and circumstance. They encourage a full rendering of events and exploration of the strands of interaction, no matter where they lead. The scope of conflict, in turn, affects the identity of the participants, the tactics used, and the outcomes that become feasible.

Choice of Mechanisms

The grievant's choice of an audience to whom to voice a complaint and the disputant's choice of an institution to which to take a controversy are primarily functions of the person and will change as objectives change. Mechanisms may also be determined by exogenous factors such as the whims of court clerks and lawyers who prefer not to try cases or by the needs of consumers in order to maintain good relations with retailers. Once a mechanism—such as an administrative agency, mediator, arbitrator, or psychotherapist—is set in motion, the rules of relevance, cast of actors, costs, delays, norms, and remedies.

Objectives Sought

A party may change his objectives in two ways: what he seeks or is willing to concede may change much. Stakes go up or down as new information becomes available, a party's means and ends are adjusted, rules are adjusted, and costs are incurred. Delay, frustration, and despair may produce changes in objectives: victims of job discrimination frequently want the job (or promotion) at the outset but later become willing to settle for money. As Aubert noted, the relationship between objectives and mechanisms is reciprocal: not only do objectives influence mechanisms, but mechanisms chosen may alter objectives. Because courts, for instance, proceed by using a limited number of norms to evaluate an even more circumscribed range of relevant facts, "the needs of the parties, their wishes for the future, cease to be relevant to the solution". Even where a legal remedy is anticipatory—alimony, worker's compensation damages for future loss—the legal system frequently prefers to award a lump sum rather than order periodic payments. Finally, the experience of disputing may stimulate a party to take steps to avoid similar disputes in the future, or to structure his behavior so as to put himself in a stronger position should a dispute occur.

Ideology

The individual's sense of entitlement to enjoy certain experiences and be free from certain disabilities is a function of the prevailing ideology, of which law is simply a component. The sense of dissatisfaction with a product or service may have been influenced by the campaigns of activists like Ralph Nader, who assert that consumers have a right to expect high quality. Persuasion may sometimes be a highly effective way of transforming ideology to create a sense of entitlement. This is the sense in which, contrary to conventional wisdom, you can make a difference in morality. Although it would be foolish to maintain that after Brown v. Board of Education, a black minority child had a sense of entitlement to integrated education, made a complaint about segregation, and engaged in a dispute when that claim was rejected, surely this has happened more often since than before 1954. Following a recent television program in Chicago in which a woman subjected to a strip search during a routine traffic citation described her experience as a damage claim against the police department, hundreds of women telephoned the station to relate similar stories. In this instance, a legal victory transformed shame into outrage, and the process of the voicing of grievances, many of which may have become disputes. When the one woman chose a legal mechanism for her complaint, a collective grievance against police practice was individualized and depoliticized. When she broadcast her legal victory on television, the dispute was collectivized and repoliticized. Ideology—and law—can also instigate disputes.

disentitlement. The enactment of worker's compensation as the "solution" to the problem of industrial accidents early in this century may have helped convince workers to rely on employer paternalism to ensure their safety and relinquish claims to control the workplace (Weinstein, 1967).

Reference Groups

Disputes may be transformed through interaction with audiences or sponsors. A tenant's dispute with a landlord may be the cause around which a tenants' association is formed; a worker's grievance against a foreman may become the stimulus to a union organizing drive or a rank-and-file movement within an existing union. This transformation may not only make an individual dispute into a collective one: it also may lead to economic or political struggle displacing legal procedures. This is especially important in the remedy-seeking behavior of disadvantaged groups. The movement from law to politics, and the accompanying expansion of the scope of disputing, are prompted and guided by the reaction of a wide social network to individual instances of injustice. Absent the support of such a network, no such movement is likely to occur. Whether that support is provided depends on a number of independent variables: the subculture of the audience—which will define the experience as injurious or harmless, encourage or discourage the expression of the grievance, and prefer certain dispute processing strategies; and the social composition of the audience—whether it is made up of peers or superiors. These variables, in turn, are influenced by social structural factors—for instance, whether the network in which the individual is situated is open or closed. In an open network, where ego is related (separately) to the members but they are not related to each other, the audience is likely to respond individually, often seeking to resolve the dispute through the exercise of superordinate influence. In a closed network, where everybody is related to everybody, the likelihood of a collective response is much greater.

Representatives and Officials

Lawyers, psychotherapists, union officials, social workers, government functionaries, and other agents and public officials help people understand their grievances and what they can do about them. In rendering this service, they almost always produce a transformation: the essence of professional jobs is to define the needs of the consumer of professional services. Generally, this leads to a definition that calls for the professional to provide such services.

Of all of the agents of dispute transformation lawyers are probably the most important. This is, in part, the result of the lawyer's central role as gatekeeper to legal institutions and facilitator of a wide range of personal and economic transactions in American society. It is obvious that lawyers play a central role in dispute decisions. Yet relatively few studies of lawyer behavior have been informed, even implicitly, by a transformation perspective. We know more about the structure of the bar and about particular ethical problems in the practice of law than we do about how lawyers interact with clients and what difference it makes.

Critics of professionals argue that they “create” at least some of the needs they satisfy. They exercise considerable power over their clients. They maintain control over the litigation and discourage clients from seeking a second opinion or taking the case elsewhere. There is evidence that lawyers often shape disputes to fit their own interests rather than those of their clients. Sometimes they systematically “cool out” clients without addressing grievances. In consumer cases lawyers may be reluctant to press claims for offending potential business clients. In defending the accused criminal, lawyers may prefer negotiating a plea bargain to trying the case. In tort litigation they prefer to settle, a package deal to claims adjusters. In other cases they may amplify grievances: lawyers recommend litigation for which a substantial fee can be charged, rather than difficult, problematic, and unprofitable negotiations about reconciliation.

Lawyers may affect transformations in another way—by rejecting requests for providing only minimal help and thereby arresting the further development of disputes at least through legal channels. Limited data suggest that lawyers respond differently to different categories of clients. This differential lawyer response contributes to variations in behavior between poor and middle class, corporate entities and individuals, normative members of ethnic majorities and minorities, and young and old.

Of course, lawyers also produce transformations about which we may be more aware. They furnish information about choices and consequences unknown to clients; help clients test the reality of the client’s perspective; help clients identify, explore, and negotiate their problems; and give emotional and social support to clients who are pursuing themselves or their objectives.

Enforcement personnel—police, prosecutors, regulatory agencies—may also produce transformations: seeking disputes in order to advance a public policy or generate a budget; will justify increased budget demands; discouraging disputes because of personnel shortages; selectively encouraging those disputes that enhance the prestige of the agency and those that diminish its significance or call for skills it lacks or are thought to be inappropriate.

Dispute Institutions

Courts, which fall at one extreme along most of the dimensions useful for describing dispute institutions, may transform the content of disputes because the substantive norms they apply differ from rules of custom or ordinary morality, and their unique norms may narrow the range of acceptable procedural evidence.

Courts may transform disputes by individualizing remedies. Some of the victims of a product may want to force the manufacturer to alter the production process. But because courts award only money damages for unintentional torts, even those victims’ concept of a collective outcome is transformed from a collective good (safety) into individual entitlements. This transformation greatly encouraged by the lawyer’s interest in creating a fund out of which a fee can be paid.

Because of the monopoly exercised by lawyers, the esoteric nature of court processes and discourse, and the burdens of pretrial procedure, the attitude of disputants may be altered by their minimal role in the courtroom and the way they are treated there. In effect, their “property” interest in the dispute is expropriated by lawyers and the state. The rediscovery of the victim in the criminal prosecution is one recognition of this. Furthermore, delays caused by court overload or foot-dragging by an adversary may transform what disputants would otherwise consider a useful procedure into pointless frustration.

The nature and potential transformational effects of courts can be seen best if we contrast litigation with another technique for handling conflict—psychotherapy. Like law, therapy individualizes conflicts and remedies. In most other ways, however, it sharply contrasts with courts and lawyers. Disputants are encouraged to describe the conflict and express their feelings about it in whatever terms they find comfortable. Since mental health professionals are trained to use anger to reduce hostility, disputants will not need to deny their feelings. The nonjudgmental posture and reflective responses of the therapist should provide emotional support for disputants, who are urged to examine the pattern of their own responses to the behavior of others. They may find, for instance, that progress toward a solution may be obstructed not by the dilatory tactics or opposition of an adversary but rather by their own reluctance to act. One objective of the process is to increase the disputant’s understanding of the motives, feelings, and behavior of others. Thus, where the outcome of successful litigation is usually an order directed to an adversary, the outcome of a successful psychotherapeutic intervention may be a change in the client.

In between courts and psychotherapy there are many other dispute institutions—arbitration, mediation, administrative hearings, and investigations—that use ingredients of each process in different combinations but always effect a transformation.

2.2 Stages of a Civil Suit

Figures 1 and 2 illustrate the stages of a civil suit.

Before commencing a suit, a lawyer (in consultation with the client) must decide who will be named as the plaintiff(s) and defendant(s) (Party Joinder), what claims the plaintiff(s) will assert (Claim Joinder), and where to file the suit (Subject Matter Jurisdiction, Personal Jurisdiction, & Venue). Decisions about party and claim joinder may constrain the choice of forum, and vice versa. At some point, it may also be necessary for the court to determine which law—state or federal, and if state law, which state—should apply to the various issues in the case.

The lawyer must then file a complaint with the court and serve a copy of the complaint and summons on the defendant(s). The defendant(s) must then respond, either by admitting or denying the allegations in the complaint (Answer, which may also include claims by the defendant(s) against plaintiffs, co-defendants, or additional parties not named in the complaint), or asking the court to dismiss the complaint on procedural grounds (Rule 12 Motions).

If the case is not dismissed at the pleadings stage, the parties will then produce evidence during the discovery process. The parties may also ask the court to decide all or part of the case based on the evidence in the pre-trial record (Summary Judgment).

If the case is not fully decided on summary judgment, it will then proceed to trial, at which time one of the parties will enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff(s) or defendant(s). After judgment has been entered, the losing party may appeal to a higher court. A final judgment may also have consequences for other lawsuits involving the same parties (Claim Preclusion).

Parties & Claims

1. Permissive Joinder of Claims

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 18

(a) In General. A party asserting a claim, counterclaim, crossclaim, or third-party claim may join, as independent or alternative claims, as many claims as it has against an opposing party.

(b) Joinder of Contingent Claims. A party may join two claims even though one of them is contingent on the disposition of the other; but the court may grant relief only in accordance with the parties' relative substantive rights. In particular, a plaintiff may state a claim for money and a claim to set aside a conveyance that is fraudulent as to that plaintiff, without first obtaining a judgment for the money.

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 42

(a) Consolidation. If actions before the court involve a common question of law or fact, the court may:

- (1) join for hearing or trial any or all matters at issue in the actions;
- (2) consolidate the actions; or
- (3) issue any other orders to avoid unnecessary cost or delay.

(b) Separate Trials. For convenience, to avoid prejudice, or to expedite and economize, the court may order a separate trial of one or more separate issues, claims, crossclaims, counterclaims, or third-party claims. When ordering a separate trial, the court must preserve any federal right to a jury trial.

Burdine v. Metropolitan Direct Property and Casualty Ins. Co., No. 3:17-cv-00093-GFVT. (E.D. Ky. Nov. 1, 2018)

GREGORY F. VAN TATENHOVE, District Judge

Plaintiff Paulina Brooke Burdine originally filed this lawsuit against defendant Direct Property and Casualty Insurance Company (hereinafter “MetDirect”) in Franklin County, Kentucky. MetDirect removed the proceedings to this Court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1332. Plaintiff asserts two claims against MetDirect stemming from two separate automobile accidents. MetDirect moved to sever these claims or, in the alternative, bifurcate the proceeding. Following the following reasons, MetDirect’s Motion to Sever or Bifurcate is DENIED.

I

Ms. Burdine initiated this lawsuit in the wake of two separate automobile accidents. Collision one took place in Scott County, Kentucky when Sandy Strong ran a red light into Ms. Burdine’s vehicle. Ms. Strong admitted fault, and her insurance policy paid Ms. Burdine to its limits. Collision two took place in Fayette County, Kentucky when Phillip Smith failed to yield the right of way to Ms. Burdine and struck her vehicle. Again, Mr. Smith admitted fault, and his insurance paid Ms. Burdine to its limits. Id. At all relevant times, Ms. Burdine had Underinsured Motorist Insurance from MetDirect.

On both occasions, the drivers carried only $25,000 in liability insurance. Ms. Burdine now wishes to collect compensation for her medical expenses from other drivers’ insurance policies. Ms. Burdine now wishes to collect compensation from MetDirect, her own insurance carrier, because her hospital expenses are in excess of the amounts received from the policies of the other drivers.

Joinder of claims is governed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 18, which states that “any person asserting a claim, counterclaim, crossclaim, or third-party claim may join, as in one proceeding, as many claims as it has against an opposing party.” The scope of joinder of claims is well settled: “The claims which may properly be joined under Rule 18(a) include those which arise out of separate and independent transactions or occurrences, as well as those which arise out of a single transaction or occurrence.”

MetDirect argues that Ms. Burdine’s claims against it are improperly joined in a single action and should be severed. In support of its position, MetDirect cites Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20(a)(2), which governs the joinder of parties. But this is the wrong rule. “Rule 20 deals with joinder of parties and becomes relevant only when there is more than one party on each side of the action. It is not concerned with joinder of claims, which is governed by Rule 18.”

MetDirect is correct that Ms. Burdine has asserted two separate claims involving two negligent drivers. In its motion, MetDirect tries to analogize this suit to one against two negligent drivers, and argues that Ms. Burdine will have to prove their negligence at trial. But Ms. Burdine has not sued these drivers in negligence. Rather, she is suing them in contract, and whatever evidence of the drivers’ negligence Ms. Burdine will have to those drivers are not defendants. There is but one defendant in this action—MetDirect—and Ms. Burdine has two claims against that defendant. As such, Ms. Burdine's claims are properly joined under Rule 18(a). Whether or not Ms. Burdine could have sued the individual drivers for negligence in a single action is irrelevant.

While Ms. Burdine's claims are properly joined against MetDirect under Rule 18, the Court may sever them if inconvenience would result “from trying two matters together which have little or nothing in common.” However, “the joinder of claims is strongly encouraged, and, concomitantly, severance should generally be granted only in ‘exceptional circumstances.’”

Rule 42 governs the bifurcation of civil trials. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 42(b). It states in relevant part, “For convenience, to avoid prejudice, or to expedite and economize, the court may order a separate trial of one or more separate issues, claims, crossclaims, counterclaims, or third-party claims.” “Bifurcation may be appropriate ‘where the evidence offered on two different issues will be wholly distinct.’” The movant has the burden of proving the appropriateness of bifurcation.

MetDirect argues that bifurcation is necessary to avoid confusing the jury. Specifically, MetDirect is concerned that “the comingling of Plaintiff’s claimed damages will . . . render it difficult, if not impossible, for the jury to accurately determine the amount of damages attributable to each incident,” which would prejudice MetDirect. But this is a problem that cannot be avoided even with bifurcation. Ms. Burdine’s collisions occurred approximately ten months apart. Ms. Burdine was still rehabilitating injuries from collision one when she was involved in collision two. At the very least, a jury assessing damages resulting from collision two will be forced to consider collision one to try and distinguish what harm is attributable solely to the second collision.

In fact, the greater risk of prejudice lies with Ms. Burdine should the Court sever these claims. To do so would force Ms. Burdine to participate in two lawsuits, greatly increasing her costs particularly with respect to medical expert testimony to her injuries. Likewise, the Court would be burdened both by the time and expense of separate proceedings in this instance. Further, as counsel for Ms. Burdine aptly puts in the Response to Defendant’s Motion to Sever:

If two trials are held, then at each trial Defendant could attempt to blame plaintiff’s injuries on the other collision. If such tactic were successful, there is the possibility that each jury could decide to attribute all of Plaintiff’s injuries to the other collision and award Plaintiff nothing when in fact all of Plaintiff’s injuries are attributable to the two collisions.

Finally, the evidence offered on these two claims would not be “wholly inconsistent” such that bifurcation is necessary. The insurance companies of the other drivers, Ms. Strong and Mr. Smith, have already paid Ms. Burdine to the limit of their policies. The larger issue at trial, then, will not be their negligence, but whether the damages Ms. Burdine suffered exceed the $25,000.00 offered under the other drivers’ respective policies. Therefore, no reason exists to bifurcate these issues at trial.

III

In sum, Ms. Burdine has properly joined her claims, which sound in contract, against defendant MetDirect. This issue is controlled by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20 has no applicability here. Further, MetDirect will not be prejudiced by trying together. On the contrary, the risk of prejudice to Ms. Burdine is high should her claims be severed, and severance would not convenience, expedite or economize the proceeding. R. Civ. P. 42(b).

2. Permissive Joinder of Parties

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 20

(a) Persons Who May Join or Be Joined.

(1) Plaintiffs. Persons may join in one action as plaintiffs if:

(A) they assert any right to relief jointly, severally, or in the alternative with respect to or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences; and

(B) any question of law or fact common to all plaintiffs will arise in the action.

(2) Defendants. Persons—as well as a vessel, cargo, or other property subject to process in rem—may be joined in one action as defendants if:

(A) any right to relief is asserted against them jointly, severally, or in the alternative with respect to or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences; and

(B) any question of law or fact common to all defendants will arise in the action.

(3) Extent of Relief. Neither a plaintiff nor a defendant need be interested in defending against all the relief demanded. The court may grant judgment to plaintiffs according to their rights, and against one or more defendants according to their liabilities.

(b) Protective Measures. The court may issue orders—including an order for separation of parties—to protect a party against embarrassment, delay, expense, or other prejudice that would result from joinder of a person against whom the party asserts no claim and who asserts no claim against the party.

Mosley v. General Motors, 497 F. 2d 1330 (8th Cir. 1973)

ROSS, Circuit Judge

Nathaniel Mosley and nine other persons joined in bringing this action individually and as class representatives alleging that their rights guaranteed under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq. and 42 U.S.C. § 1981 were denied by General Motors and Local 25, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agriculture Implement Workers of America Union by reason of their color and race. Each of the ten named plaintiffs had, prior to the filing of the complaint, filed a charge with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission EEOC asserting the facts underlying these claims. Pursuant thereto, the EEOC made a reasonable cause finding that General Motors, Fisher Body Division and Chevrolet Division, and the Union had engaged in unlawful employment practices in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Accordingly, the charging parties were notified by EEOC of their right to institute a civil action in the appropriate federal district court, pursuant to § 706(e) of Title VII, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(e).

In each of the first eight counts of the twelve-count complaint, eight of the ten plaintiffs alleged that General Motors, Chevrolet Division, had engaged in unlawful employment practices by: "discriminating against Negroes as regards promotions, terms and conditions of employment"; "retaliating against Negro employees who protested actions made unlawful by Title VII of the Act and by discharging some because they protested said unlawful acts"; "failing to hire Negro employees as a class on the basis of race"; "failing to hire females as a class on the basis of sex"; "discharging Negro employees on the basis of race"; and "discriminating against Negroes and females in the granting of relief time." Each additionally charged that the defendant Union had engaged in unlawful employment practices "with respect to the granting of relief time to Negro and female employees" and "by failing to pursue 6a grievances." The remaining two plaintiffs made similar allegations against General Motors, Fisher Body Division. All of the individual plaintiffs requested injunctive relief, back pay, attorneys fees and costs.

The district court ordered that "insofar as the first ten counts are concerned, those ten counts shall be severed into ten separate causes of action," and each plaintiff was directed to bring a separate action based upon his complaint, duly and separately filed.

In reaching this conclusion on joinder, the district court followed the reasoning of Smith v. North American Rockwell Corp., 50 F.R.D. 515 (N.D.Oklahoma 1970), which, in a somewhat analogous situation, found there was no right to relief arising out of the same transaction, occurrence or series of transactions or occurrences, and that there was no question of law or fact common to all plaintiffs sufficient to sustain joinder under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20(a). Similarly, the district court here felt that the plaintiffs' joint actions against General Motors and the Union presented a variety of issues having little relationship to one another; that they had only one common problem, i. e. the defendant; and that as pleaded the joint actions were completely unmanageable. Upon entering the order, and upon application of the plaintiffs, the district court found that its decision involved a controlling question of law as to which there is a substantial ground for difference of opinion and that any of the parties might make application for appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). We granted the application to permit this interlocutory appeal and for the following reasons we affirm in part and reverse in part.

Rule 20(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides:

All persons may join in one action as plaintiffs if they assert any right to relief jointly or in the alternative in respect of or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or transactions or occurrences and if any question of law or fact common to all these persons in the action.

Additionally, Rule 20(b) and Rule 42(b) vest in the district court the discretion to order trials or make such other orders as will prevent delay or prejudice. In this manner, the civil action is made a matter for the discretion of the district court, and a determination of the question of joinder of parties will be reversed on appeal only upon a showing of abuse of discretion. To determine whether the district court's order was proper herein, we must look at the policy and law that have developed around the operation of Rule 20.

The purpose of the rule is to promote trial convenience and expedite the final determination of disputes, thereby preventing multiple lawsuits. Single trials generally tend to lessen expense and inconvenience to all concerned. Reflecting this policy, the Supreme Court

Under the Rules, the impulse is toward entertaining the broadest possible scope of action with fairness to the parties; joinder of claims, parties and remedies is strongly encouraged.

United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715 (1966).

Permissive joinder is not, however, applicable in all cases. The rule imposes two requisites to the joinder of parties: (1) a right to relief must be asserted by, or against, plaintiff or defendant relating to or arising out of the same transaction or occurrence, or transactions or occurrences; and (2) some question of law or fact common to all the parties must arise in the action.

In ascertaining whether a particular factual situation constitutes a single transaction or occurrence for purposes of Rule 20, a case by case approach is generally pursued. In the past, fast rules have been established under the rule. However, construction of the terms "transaction" or "occurrence" as used in the context of Rule 13(a) counterclaims offers some guidance in application of this test. For the purposes of the latter rule, "Transaction" is a word of flexible meaning. It may comprehend a series of many occurrences depending not so much upon the immediateness of their connection as upon the relationship.

Moore v. New York Cotton Exchange, 270 U.S. 593 (1926). Accordingly, all "logically related events" entitling a person to institute a legal action against another generally are regarded as being part of a transaction or occurrence. The analogous interpretation of the terms as used in Rule 20 would permit all reasonably related claims for relief by or against different parties to be tried in the same proceeding. Absolute identity of all events is unnecessary.

This construction accords with the result reached in United States v. Mississippi, 380 U.S. 128 (1965), a suit brought by the United States against the State of Mississippi, the election commissioners, and six voting registrars of the State, charging them with engaging in acts and practices hampering and destroying the right of black citizens of Mississippi to vote. The district court concluded that the complaint improperly attempted to hold the six county registrars jointly liable for what amounted to nothing more than individual torts committed by them separately against separate applicants. In reversing, the Supreme Court said:

But the complaint charged that the registrars had acted and were continuing to act as part of a state-wide system designed to enforce the registration laws in a way that would inevitably deprive colored people of the right to vote solely because of their color. On such an allegation the joinder of all the registrars as defendants in a single suit is authorized by Rule 20(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. These registrars were alleged to be carrying on activities which were part of a series of transactions or occurrences the validity of which depended to a large extent upon "questions of law or fact common to all of them."

Id. at 142-143.

Here too, then, the plaintiffs have asserted a right to relief arising out of the same transactions or occurrences. Each of the ten plaintiffs alleged that he had been injured by the same general policy of discrimination on the part of General Motors and the Union. Since a "state-wide system designed to enforce the registration laws in a way that would inevitably deprive colored people of the right to vote" was determined to arise out of the same series of transactions or occurrences, we conclude that a company-wide policy purportedly designed to discriminate against blacks in employment similarly arises out of the same series of transactions or occurrences. Thus the plaintiffs meet the first requisite for joinder under Rule 20(a).

The second requisite necessary to sustain a permissive joinder under the rule is that a question of law or fact common to all the parties will arise in the action. The rule does not require that all questions of law and fact raised by the dispute be common. Yet, neither does it establish any qualitative or quantitative test of commonality. For this reason, cases construing the parallel requirement under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(a) provide a helpful framework for construction of the commonality required by Rule 20. In general, those cases that have focused on Rule 23(a)(2) have given it a permissive application so that common questions have been found to exist in a wide range of context. Specifically, with respect to employment discrimination cases under Title VII, courts have found that the discriminatory character of a defendant's conduct is basic to the class, and the fact that the individual class members may have suffered different effects from the alleged discrimination is immaterial for the purposes of the prerequisite. In this vein, one court has said:

Although the actual effects of a discriminatory policy may thus vary throughout the class, the existence of the discriminatory policy threatens the entire class. And whether the Damoclean threat of a racially discriminatory policy hangs over the racial class is a question of fact common to all the members of the class.

The right to relief here depends on the ability to demonstrate that each of the plaintiffs was wronged by racially discriminatory policies on the part of the defendants General Mills and the American Union. The discriminatory character of the defendants' conduct is thus basic to each plaintiff's recovery. The fact that each plaintiff may have suffered different effects from discrimination is immaterial for the purposes of determining the common question of law of fact. Thus, we conclude that the second requisite for joinder under Rule 20(a) is also satisfied.

For the reasons set forth above, we conclude that the district court abused its discretion in severing the joined actions. The difficulties in ultimately adjudicating damages to the individual plaintiffs are not so overwhelming as to require such severance. If appropriate, severance may be granted as to any particular issue after the determination of common questions of law.

The judgment of the district court disallowing joinder of the plaintiffs' individual claims is hereby reversed and remanded with directions to permit the plaintiffs to proceed jointly.

3. Counterclaims

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 13

(a) Compulsory Counterclaim.

(1) In General. A pleading must state as a counterclaim any claim that—at the time of service—the pleader has against an opposing party if the claim:

(A) arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the plaintiff's claim; and

(B) does not require adding another party over whom the court cannot exercise jurisdiction.

(2) Exceptions. The pleader need not state the claim if:

(A) when the action was commenced, the claim was the subject of another pending action by the same parties in the same or another court;

(B) the opposing party sued on its claim by attachment or other process to collect a debt, and the pleader could not establish personal jurisdiction over the opposing party on that claim, and the pleader could not assert any counterclaim under this rule.

(b) Permissive Counterclaim. A pleading may state as a counterclaim against an opposing party any claim that is not compulsory.

(h) Joining Additional Parties. Rules 19 and 20 govern the addition of a person as a defendant to a counterclaim or crossclaim.

Jones v. Ford Motor Credit, 358 F.3d 205 (2d Cir. 2004)

NEWMAN, Circuit Judge

This appeal concerns the availability of subject matter jurisdiction for permissive counterclaims. It also demonstrates the normal utility of early decision of a motion for class certification. Defendant-Appellant Ford Motor Credit Company (“Ford Credit”) appeals from the June 14, 2002, judgment of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York (Lawrence M. McKenna, District Judge) dismissing for lack of jurisdiction its permissive counterclaims against three of the four Plaintiffs-Appellees and its conditional counterclaims against members of the putative class that the Plaintiffs-Appellees seek to certify. We conclude that supplemental jurisdiction authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 1337 may be available for the permissive counterclaims, but that the District Court’s discretion under subsection 1337(c) should not be exercised in this case until a ruling on the Plaintiffs’ motion for class certification. We therefore vacate and remand.

Background

Plaintiffs-Appellees Joyce Jones, Martha L. Edwards, Lou Cooper, and Vincent E. Jackson (“Plaintiffs”), individually and as class representatives, sued Ford Credit alleging racial discrimination under the Equal Credit Opportunity Act (“ECOA”), 15 U.S.C. § 1691 et seq. (2003). They had purchased Ford vehicles under Ford Credit’s financing plan. They alleged that the financing plan discriminated against African-Americans. Although the financing rate was primarily based on objective criteria, Ford Credit permitted its dealers to mark up the rate, using subjective criteria to assess non-risk charges. The Plaintiffs alleged that the mark-up policy penalized African-American customers with higher rates than those imposed on similarly situated Caucasian customers.

In its Answer, Ford Credit denied the charges of racial discrimination and also asserted state-law counterclaims against Jones, Edwards, and Cooper for the amounts of their unpaid car loans. Ford Credit alleged that Jones was in default on her obligations under her contract for the purchase of a 1995 Ford Windstar, and that Edwards and Cooper were in default on payments for their joint purchase of a 1995 Mercury Cougar. Additionally, in the event that a class was certified, Ford Credit asserted conditional counterclaims against any member of that class who was in default on a car loan from Ford Credit. The Plaintiffs moved to dismiss Ford Credit’s counterclaims for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1), lack of personal jurisdiction, Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(2), improper venue, Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(3), and failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6).

The District Court granted the Plaintiffs’ motion and dismissed Ford Credit’s counterclaims, summarizing its reasons for doing so as follows: “Defendant’s counterclaims do not meet the standard for compulsory counterclaims[, and] pursuant to § 1337(c)(4), there are compelling reasons to decline to exercise jurisdiction over the counterclaims.”

In reaching these conclusions, Judge McKenna acknowledged some uncertainty in determining that the counterclaims were permissive, he expressed doubt as to the just consequence of that determination. On the one hand, he believed, as the Plaintiff argued, that permissive counterclaims must be dismissed if they lack an independent basis of federal jurisdiction. On the other hand, he acknowledged that “there was some authority to suggest that the court should determine, based on the particular circumstances of the case, whether it had the authority to exercise supplemental jurisdiction under § 1337(a)” over a counterclaim, regardless of whether it was compulsory or permissive.

To resolve his uncertainty, Judge McKenna initially ruled that the counterclaims were permissive, “must be dismissed for lack of an independent basis of federal jurisdiction.” However, he also ruled that, if he was wrong and if supplemental jurisdiction under section 1337 was available, he would still dismiss the counterclaims in the exercise of the discretion subsection of the statute, which applies to district courts.

On March 27, 2003, the District Court entered judgment pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 54(b) in favor of the Plaintiffs, dismissing Ford Credit’s counterclaims without prejudice. Ford Credit appealed the decision, but the Court of Appeals affirmed the decision.

Discussion

I. Are Ford Credit’s Counterclaims Permissive?

Fed.R.Civ.P. 13(a) defines a compulsory counterclaim as any claim which at the time of serving the pleading the pleader has against any opposing party, if it arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party’s claim and does not require for its adjudication the presence of third parties of whom the court cannot obtain jurisdiction.

Such counterclaims are compulsory in the sense that if they are not raised, they cannot be raised later. Fed.R.Civ.P. 13(b) defines a permissive counterclaim as “any claim against an opposing party, if it arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party’s claim.”

Whether a counterclaim is compulsory or permissive turns on whether the counterclaim arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party’s claim. This Circuit has long considered this standard met when there is a “logical relationship” between the counterclaim and the main claim.

Although the “logical relationship” test does not require “an absolute identity of the backgrounds,” the “essential facts of the claims [must be] so logically connected that considerations of judicial economy and fairness dictate that all the issues be resolved in one lawsuit.”

We agree with the District Court that the debt collection counterclaims were permissive rather than compulsory. The Plaintiffs' ECOA claim centers on Ford Credit's mark-up policy, based on subjective factors, which allegedly resulted in higher finance charges on their purchase contracts than on those of similarly situated White customers. Ford Credit's debt collection counterclaims are related to those purchase contracts, but not to any particular clause or rate. Rather, the debt collection counterclaims concern the individual Plaintiffs' non-payment after the contract price was set. Thus, the relationship between the counterclaims and the ECOA claim is "logical" only in the sense that the sale, allegedly on discriminatory credit terms, was the "but for" cause of the non-payment. That is not the sort of relationship contemplated by our case law on compulsory counterclaims. The essential facts for proving the counterclaims and the ECOA claim are not so closely related that resolving both sets of issues in one lawsuit would yield judicial efficiency. Indeed, Ford Credit does not even challenge the ruling that its counterclaims are permissive.

Ginwright v. Exeter Finance, No. TDC-16-0565 (D. Md. 2016)

CHUANG, District Judge

On February 26, 2016, Plaintiff Billy Ginwright filed this action against Defendant Exeter Finance Corporation ("Exeter") for violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("TCPA"), 47 U.S.C. § 227 (2012), and the Maryland Telephone Consumer Protection Act ("MTCPA"), Md. Code Ann., Com. Law §§ 14-3201 to -3202 (West 2013). On May 11, 2016, Exeter filed its Amended Answer and Counterclaim, alleging that Ginwright breached the contract that led Exeter to seek to collect a debt by telephone. Pending before the Court is Ginwright's Motion to Dismiss Exeter's Counterclaim. For the following reasons, the Motion is granted.

Background

In May 2013, Ginwright entered into a contract with BW Auto Outlet of Hanover, Maryland to finance the purchase of a vehicle. Within the contract, BW Auto Outlet assigned all of its rights under the contract to Exeter. In his Complaint, Ginwright alleges that in seeking to collect a debt under the contract, Exeter called Ginwright's cellular phone "hundreds of times" by means of an automatic dialing system. Compl. ¶¶ 22-23. Ginwright maintains that Exeter made the calls for non-emergency purposes and without his prior express consent. He also asserts that he repeatedly told Exeter to cease calling him, to no avail. Rather, Exeter representatives told him that they would not stop calling his cellular phone, and that the calls would continue through the automatic dialing system. As a result, with rare exceptions, Ginwright received three to seven calls from Exeter every day between December 4 and December 17, 2014; March 5 and April 29, 2015; and May 10 and June 5, 2015.

In its Counterclaim, Exeter alleges that Ginwright breached the original contract when he failed to make car payments, requiring Exeter to repossess the vehicle. Exeter contends that, following the sale of the vehicle and the application of the sale proceeds to the full amount owed, Ginwright owed a remainder of $23,782.17 under the contract as of May 3, 2016.

Discussion

Ginwright is seeking dismissal of the counterclaim pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Ginwright asserts that Exeter has failed to establish any independent basis for jurisdiction over the counterclaim and that this Court cannot exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the counterclaim because it is a permissive counterclaim. Exeter counters that, since the enactment of 28 U.S.C. § 1337, a court can exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a permissive counterclaim, and that, in any event, the counterclaim is compulsory.

III. Permissive Counterclaim

In assessing whether a counterclaim is compulsory or permissive, courts consider four inquiries:

- (1) Are the issues of fact and law raised in the claim and counterclaim largely the same?
- (2) Would res judicata bar a subsequent suit on the party's counterclaim, absent, the counterclaim rule?
- (3) Will substantially the same evidence support or refute the claim as well as the counterclaim and
- (4) Is there any logical relationship between the claim and counterclaim?

These inquiries are more akin to a set of guidelines than a rigid test, such that a "court may answer all these questions in the affirmative for the counterclaim to be compulsory."

Applying the four inquiries here, the Court concludes that Exeter's counterclaim is permissive. First, the issues of fact and law raised in the TCPA claim and breach of contract counterclaim are largely dissimilar. The TCPA bars "any call (other than a call made for emergency purposes) made with the prior express consent of the called party) using any automatic telephone dialing system or an artificial or prerecorded voice" to any telephone number assigned to a telephone service. 47 U.S.C. § 227(b)(1)(A)(iii). Thus, to prevail on this claim, Ginwright must establish that Exeter made calls to the plaintiff's cellular phone, by means of an automatic telephone dialing system, without Ginwright's express consent or an emergency purpose. There is no requirement to show any underlying contractual dispute or debt that led to such phone calls. Moreover, a breach of contract counterclaim requires proof of an agreement between the parties, whereas by Ginwright to honor the terms of that agreement to make timely car payments. According to Ginwright, his defense may be based on the assertion that Exeter did not comply with the statutorily required repossession and resale procedures contained in the Creditors' Closed End Credit ("CLEC") provisions of the Maryland Commercial Law Article, which are not satisfied in order for a lender to collect a deficiency judgment for an unpaid car loan. There is no requirement to show any use or lack of use of telephone calls to the borrower. Thus, there is no overlap between the two sets of legal and factual issues.

Second, because the legal and factual issues are different, the evidence would not be “substantially the same.” While the alleged contract underlying the counterclaim might be admissible on the TCPA claim to the extent that it is relevant to establishing prior express consent for phone calls or the lack thereof, the evidence on the TCPA claim will primarily consist of records and testimony about the number of calls received and the use of the automatic dialing system, which would be of no relevance to the breach of contract counterclaim. Likewise, Exeter’s counterclaim, which contains no allegations relating to phone calls or an automatic dialing system, will rely primarily on evidence that does not pertain to the TCPA claim, such as proof of Ginwright’s failure to make car payments and evidence that Exeter did or did not repossess the car and resell it in accordance with Maryland’s CLEC requirements.

Third, res judicata would not bar a subsequent suit on the breach of contract counterclaim. “The preclusive effect of a federal-court judgment is determined by federal common law.” An action is precluded when:

- 1) the prior judgment was final and on the merits, and rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction in accordance with the requirements of due process; 2) the parties are identical, or in privity, in the two actions; and, 3) the claim in the second matter is based upon the same cause of action involved in the earlier proceeding.

Claims “based upon the same cause of action” are those which “arise out of the same transaction or series of transactions, or the same core of operative facts.” As discussed above, Exeter’s counterclaim, which is associated with the sales agreement for a vehicle, derives from a different core set of facts than Ginwright’s TCPA claim, which is based on numerous phone calls placed to his cellular phone from December 2014 to July 2015. Thus, res judicata would not bar a subsequent breach of contract claim by Exeter.

Fourth, any logical relationship between the TCPA claim and the breach of contract counterclaim is a loose one. Although the TCPA claim would likely not have arisen in the absence of the original contract at issue on the counterclaim, there is little or no connection between a claim concerning the misuse of an automatic dialing system and a counterclaim alleging the failure to pay back a loan.

Considering all of the factors, the Court concludes that Exeter’s counterclaim is permissive. Although the Fourth Circuit has not addressed this precise issue, it has held that where a plaintiff alleged a violation of the disclosure requirements of the Truth-in-Lending Act (“TILA”), 15 U.S.C. §§ 1601-1667(f) (2012), a counterclaim seeking payment of the undeflected debt was permissive. In Whigham, the court concluded that the counterclaim raised “significantly different” issues of law and fact than those presented by the TILA claim and that evidence on the two claims differed because only the counterclaim depended on verification of the debt and proof of default. It also concluded that the claims were “not logically related” because although the federal claim involved the same loan, it did not “arise from the obligations created by the contractual transaction.” These same conclusions apply here, where Ginwright’s TCPA claim involves different issues of fact and law, relies on different evidence, and is no more logically related to the counterclaim than the TILA claim in Whigham was to its counterclaim.

The Court's conclusion is consistent with those of several district courts that have held that, in the case of a TCPA claim, a counterclaim alleging a failure to pay the debt that was the subject of the telephone calls was permissive.

Exeter's citation to a single district court case reaching the contrary conclusion in Calvary Portfolio Servs., (S.D. Cal. 2014), is unpersuasive. In Horton, the court applied a "logical relationship" test, followed by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit's four-part inquiry. Moreover, other courts applying a logical relationships test have concluded that a breach of contract counterclaim to a TCPA claim is permissive.

Pace v. Timmermann's Ranch, 795 F.3d 748 (7th Cir. 2015)

RIPPLE, Circuit Judge

In 2011, Timmermann's Ranch and Saddle Shop ("Timmermann's") brought an action against its former employee, Jeanne Pace, for conversion, breach of fiduciary duty, fraud, and enrichment. It alleged that Ms. Pace had stolen merchandise and money from the company. Ms. Pace filed her answer and a counterclaim in early 2011.

In 2013, Ms. Pace and Dan Pace, her husband, filed a separate action against Timmermann's and four of its employees, Dale Timmermann, Carol Timmermann, Dawn Manley, and Karen Rigsby (collectively "the individual defendants"). They alleged that these defendants conspired to facilitate Ms. Pace's false arrest. Ms. Pace alleged that, as a result of their conduct, she and her husband had suffered severe and extreme emotional distress. Mr. Pace claimed a loss of consortium.

Ms. Pace filed a motion to consolidate these two actions. The court granted the motion with respect to discovery, but denied the motion with respect to trial and instructed Ms. Pace that she should request consolidation for trial after the close of discovery. In the midst of the litigation, however, the district court dismissed Ms. Pace's 2013 action after concluding that the claims she asserted were actually compulsory counterclaims that should have been filed with her action in Timmermann's 2011 complaint. Ms. Pace appeals the dismissal of her 2013 action and the denial of her motion to consolidate.

We hold that Ms. Pace's claims against parties other than Timmermann's were not compulsory counterclaims because Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 13 and 20, in combination, do not permit a litigant to join additional parties to bring what would otherwise be a compulsory counterclaim. We also hold that because Ms. Pace's claim for abuse of process against Timmermann's prior to the filing of her counterclaim, it was a mandatory counterclaim. We therefore reverse in part and reverse in part the judgment of the district court and remand the case for further proceedings.

I. Background

A.

The issues in this case present a somewhat complex procedural situation. For ease of reading, we first will set forth the substantive allegations of each party. Then, we will set forth the procedural history of this litigation in the district court.

Timmermann's boards, buys, and sells horses, as well as operates both a ranch and a "saddle shop," in which it sells merchandise for owners and riders of horses. When this dispute arose, Carol and Dale Timmermann managed Timmermann's. Dawn Manley and Tammy Rigsby were employees of Timmermann's.

In its 2011 complaint, Timmermann's alleged that, while employed as a bookkeeper at Timmermann's, Ms. Pace had embezzled funds and stolen merchandise. According to the complaint, beginning at an unknown time, Ms. Pace regularly began removing merchandise from Timmermann's without paying; she would then sell those articles on eBay for her personal benefit. Timmermann's further alleged that it discovered that Ms. Pace was selling items on eBay through a private sting operation.

According to the complaint, in February 2011, a Timmermann's employee discovered some of the company's merchandise in Ms. Pace's car. At this point, Timmermann's fired Ms. Pace. Thereafter, during a review of its records, including the checking account maintained by Ms. Pace, Timmermann's discovered that a check that Ms. Pace had represented as being payable to a hay vendor actually had been made payable to cash. Timmermann's also discovered that, on at least eight occasions, Ms. Pace had utilized the company's business credit card to make personal purchases.

In her 2013 complaint, Ms. Pace alleged that her conduct while working at Timmermann's was consistent with its usual course of business. She stated that Timmermann's had a practice of allowing employees to use cash to purchase merchandise at cost or, alternatively, by deducting the merchandise's value from the employee's pay. She maintains that she had purchased the company's merchandise under that established practice. She also alleged that Carol Timmermann, her supervisor, knew that she had sold the company's merchandise at flea markets and never had objected.

Ms. Pace also maintained that she was instructed to write corporate checks out to cash and to note the payee in the check records. Pursuant to those instructions, Ms. Pace had written checks to cash and recorded the payee and purpose of the check in the check records. Ms. Pace further alleged that Carol Timmermann had instructed her to use Carol's credit card, which was used as the corporate credit card, for personal purchases and to reimburse Carol, and not Timmermann's, for those purchases.

According to Ms. Pace's complaint, on February 14, 2011, Dale Timmermann called the Lake County, Illinois, Sheriff's Office and accused Ms. Pace of stealing over $100,000 in merchandise from Timmermann's. On February 14 and 15, Dale Timmermann took affirmative steps to convince the Sheriff's Office to arrest Ms. Pace by stating that Ms. Pace had stolen approximately $100,000 in merchandise and that Ms. Pace had been changing inventory on the books. Ms. Pace was taken into custody by the Lake County Sheriff's Office on February 16, 2011, and released on February 16.

Following her release from custody, the individual defendants continued to provide the Sheriff's Office with information about Ms. Pace's allegedly unlawful conduct. On March 3, 2011, the State's Attorney brought charges against Ms. Pace premised on the information provided by the company's employees. Ms. Pace was charged with theft, forgery, and unlawful use of a credit card.

B.

We turn now to the procedural history of this litigation in the district court, as it has produced the situation before us today.

On March 3, 2011, Timmermann's filed its civil complaint against Ms. Pace, alleging breach of fiduciary duty, fraud, and unjust enrichment. It sought to recover the merchandise and money that Ms. Pace allegedly had stolen. Ms. Pace filed her counterclaims on April 5, 2011.

On February 1, 2013, Ms. Pace and Mr. Pace (collectively "the Paces") filed a complaint against Timmermann's and the individual defendants, alleging that they had conspired to effectuate Ms. Pace's false arrest. Ms. Pace alleged that she had suffered severe and extreme emotional distress; Mr. Pace claimed a loss of consortium. Specifically, the Paces' complaint included the following counts: "false arrest/false imprisonment/in concert liability" (Count I); "abuse of process" (Count II); "intentional infliction of emotional distress" (Count III); "conspiracy to commit false arrest/false imprisonment/in concert liability" (Count IV); "abuse of process and intentional infliction of emotional distress" (Count V); "aiding and abetting abuse of process and intentional infliction of emotional distress" (Count VI); and "loss of consortium" (Count VII). Only four counts, Counts I-III and VII, specifically named Timmermann's as a defendant. The remaining counts were directed at Dale Timmermann or the other individual defendants.

On March 15, 2013, Ms. Pace filed a motion to consolidate the two cases. On April 1, 2013, the district court consolidated the cases for the purpose of discovery and pretrial practice. The court denied without prejudice the motion to consolidate the cases for trial; it stated that the parties could file a motion to consolidate for trial after discovery.

On May 2, 2013, Timmermann's and the individual defendants moved to dismiss Ms. Pace's claims under Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) and 13(a). They contended that her claims should have been filed as compulsory counterclaims in the 2011 action. Thereafter, Ms. Pace moved to amend her 2011 counterclaim and to consolidate the cases for trial. The court set a briefing schedule for the company's motion to dismiss and held Ms. Pace's motion to consolidate in abeyance.

In December 2013, the district court granted the company's motion to dismiss. The court concluded that Ms. Pace's separate claims were barred because they were compulsory counterclaims that should have been brought in the 2011 action because the claims arose out of the same transaction or occurrence. Noting that her 2013 complaint had indicated that the fear of being indicted caused her emotional distress, the court held that Ms. Pace's claims were in existence when the 2011 action was filed; it therefore rejected Ms. Pace's argument that her abuse-of-process claim was not in existence until she was charged. In the district court's view, the absence of Mr. Pace and the individual defendants from the 2011 action did not preclude the court's conclusion that Ms. Pace's claims were compulsory counterclaims because Mr. Pace and the individual defendants could have been joined in the 2011 action under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20.

II. Discussion

The Paces now appeal the dismissal of the 2013 action. They concede that Ms. Pace's false arrest and emotional distress claims against Timmermann's were compulsory counterclaims and therefore properly dismissed. They contend, however, that Ms. Pace's claims against the individual defendants and Mr. Pace's claims for loss of consortium were not compulsory counterclaims. They also submit that Ms. Pace's abuse of process claim against Timmermann's did not "exist" when the 2011 action was filed and therefore could not have been a compulsory counterclaim.

A.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 13 governs compulsory counterclaims. Rule 13(a)(1) provides:

In General. A pleading must state as a counterclaim any claim that—at the time of its service—the pleader has against an opposing party if the claim:

- (A) arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party's claim; and
- (B) does not require adding another party over whom the court cannot acquire jurisdiction.

The text of this subsection limits the definition of compulsory counterclaim to those claims that the pleader has against an opposing party; it does not provide for the joinder of parties. Instead, in a later subsection, it expressly incorporates the standards set out for the required joinder of parties under Rule 19 and the permissive joinder of parties under Rule 20. Specifically, subsection 13(h) provides: "Rules 19 and 20 govern the addition of a person as a party to a counterclaim or crossclaim."

Rule 19 requires that a party be joined if, "in that person's absence, the court cannot accord complete relief among existing parties," or if proceeding in the party's absence may "impair or impede the person's ability to protect his interest" or "leave an existing party subject to a substantial risk of incurring double, multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations." Fed.R.Civ.P. 19(a)(1). In contrast, Rule 20 allows for parties to be joined if "any right to relief is asserted against them jointly, severally, or in the alternative with respect to or arising out of the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences; and any question of law or fact common to all defendants will arise in the action." Fed.R.Civ.P. 20(a)(2).

The district court did not hold, and Timmermann’s does not contend, that the defendants named in Ms. Pace’s complaint were opposing parties under Rule 13(a) of the Rules. Nor does the company’s claim that the individual defendants were required to join under Rule 19. Instead, Timmermann’s submits that, because the district court could have jurisdiction over the individual defendants and could have joined them under Rule 20, it was appropriate to treat Ms. Pace’s claims as compulsory counterclaims. In essence, Timmermann combines the permissive joinder rule under Rule 20 with the compulsory joinder requirement in Rule 13 to create a rule for compulsory joinder.

The text of the rules, however, do not permit such an arrangement. Timmermann ignores the text of Rule 13(a)(1)(B), which provides that a claim is not a compulsory counterclaim “requires adding another party over whom the court cannot acquire jurisdiction.” In its statement, Timmermann’s deviates that, because the district court could have jurisdiction over the individual defendants, the claims against them must be treated as compulsory counterclaims. Rule 13, however, does not require the joinder of parties limited to the filing of counterclaims. Although Rule 13(a)(1)(B), like Rule 19, encourages claims be resolved in one action with all the interested parties before the court, Rule 13 achieves this objective by allowing, not mandating, that a defendant bring counterclaims against additional parties. Whether a party must be joined in an action continues to be governed by Rule 19. Rule 13(a)(1)(B) does not transform Rule 20 into a mandatory joinder rule.

Requiring Ms. Pace to bring the claims against the individual defendants as a counterclaim to the initial action might well serve judicial economy, but the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not require such a result. The Rules strike a delicate balance between (1) a plaintiff’s interest in structuring litigation, (2) a defendant’s “wish to avoid multiple litigation, or inconvenience,” (3) an outsider’s interest in joining the litigation, and (4) “the interest of the courts and litigants in complete, consistent, and efficient settlement of controversies.” The rules generally allow a plaintiff to decide who to join in an action. A plaintiff’s interest in structuring litigation is overridden only when the prejudice to the defendant or an absent party is substantial and cannot be avoided. Otherwise, the threat of duplicative litigation generally is insufficient to override a plaintiff’s interest in this regard.

Indeed, if Ms. Pace had brought her claim before Timmermann’s filed suit, she could have chosen to file separate actions against Timmermann’s and the individual defendants. It makes no sense to require Ms. Pace to join the individual defendants under Rule 20 in order to file her claims in the same action when, if she initially had been the plaintiff, she would not have been required to join those same parties.

Timmermann’s recognizes that Rule 20 does not require a litigant to join additional parties. Therefore, because a party is not required to join additional parties under Rule 20, the district court erred by barring Ms. Pace’s claims against the individual defendants as compulsory counterclaims for failing to join them when she brought her counterclaim.

B.

We turn now to whether the district court appropriately characterized Ms. Pace's claim against Timmermann's for abuse of process as a compulsory counterclaim. Ms. Pace submits that her abuse of process claim did not exist until there was "process" in the form of an information or indictment. She contends that the facts alleged in the 2013 complaint that occurred before she was charged only demonstrated one element of the claim, the defendants' mens rea. "In order to be a compulsory counterclaim, Rule 13(a) requires that a claim exist at the time of pleading." Thus, "a party need not assert a compulsory counterclaim if it has not matured when the party serves his answer."

Although neither an indictment nor an arrest is a necessary element to bring an abuse of process claim under Illinois law, a plaintiff is required to plead some improper use of legal process. In most circumstances, this requirement is met through an arrest or physical seizure of property.

Ms. Pace was arrested on February 15, 2011. The company's 2011 complaint was filed on March 3, 2011, and Ms. Pace filed her answer and counterclaim on April 5, 2011. Consequently, the only fact not in Ms. Pace's possession at the time she filed her answer was the March 13, 2012 information. Illinois courts are clear, however, that an arrest is sufficient to bring an abuse of process claim. Ms. Pace's abuse of process claim therefore matured when she was arrested, which occurred before she filed her responsive pleading. Her failure to raise the abuse of process claim as a counterclaim along with her answer therefore contravenes Rule 13.

Indeed, in alleging an abuse of process, Ms. Pace primarily relies on her 2011 arrest, and not on the fact that she was charged. The complaint alleges that the defendants intentionally injured and caused injury to Ms. Pace by giving "false information to law enforcement and explicitly or implicitly urging the arrest and/or the indictment of [Ms. Pace]." The complaint makes it clear that Ms. Pace could have brought her claim following her 2011 arrest, and thus, her abuse of process claim matured at that time.

Conclusion

We conclude that the district court erred in dismissing the Paces' 2013 complaint in its entirety. Because neither Rule 13 nor Rule 20 provide for compulsory joinder, Ms. Pace's claims against the individual defendants and Mr. Pace's claims for loss of consortium were not compulsory counterclaims. Ms. Pace's abuse of process claim against Timmermann's was in existence when Ms. Pace filed her 2011 answer and counterclaim, and therefore the district court was correct to bar her subsequent abuse of process claim against Timmermann's.

4. Crossclaims

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 13

(g) Crossclaim Against a Coparty. A pleading may state as a crossclaim any claim against a coparty if the claim arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the original action or of a counterclaim, or if the claim relates to any property that is the subject matter of the original action. The crossclaim may include a claim that the coparty or may be liable to the crossclaimant for all or part of a claim asserted in the action or for a claim that the coparty has against the crossclaimant.

(h) Joining Additional Parties. Rules 19 and 20 govern the addition of a person as a defendant to an action by way of a counterclaim or crossclaim.

Kirkcaldy v. Richmond County Bd. of Ed., 212 F.3d 289 (M.D.N.C. 2002)

BEATY, District Judge.

This case comes before the Court on Defendant Richmond County Board of Education and Third-party Defendants Bruce Stanback, Sandy Lampley, Herman Williams, M. Mary Carroll, Jackson Dawkins, Carlene Hill, and Larry K. Weatherly's ("Individual Defendants") Motion to Dismiss Defendant Marcus Smith's ("Smith") Cross-claim party Complaint. For the reasons stated below, the Motion to Dismiss is hereby GRANTED.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Until August of 2000, Smith served as a principal of the Leak Street Alternative School, the Richmond County School System overseen by the Board. On September 14, 2000, Elizabeth Kirkcaldy ("Kirkcaldy"), who had worked as a secretary at the Leak Street Alternative School, filed a lawsuit against Smith and the Board. Kirkcaldy's Complaint alleges that during approximately July 20, 1999 to June 12, 2000, she was subjected to sexual harassment by Smith, who served as her direct supervisor during that time. Kirkcaldy claims that during this period, Smith repeatedly made unwelcome sexual contact with Kirkcaldy. Kirkcaldy also asserts that Smith frequently made comments of a sexual nature to her. Based on these facts, Kirkcaldy asserts the following claims: hostile work environment pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a); intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress against both the Board and a claim for negligent supervision, retention and hiring against the Board.

In his Answer to Kirkcaldy's Complaint, Smith brings a cross-claim against the Board and a third-party complaint against the Superintendent of the Richmond County School System, Larry K. Weatherly ("Weatherly"), and Board members Bruce Stanback, Sandy Lampley, Herman Williams, Myrtle Stogner, Mary Carroll, Jackson Dawkins, and Carlene Hill, all in their individual and official capacities. Smith's claim against these Defendants is filed pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 based on the Individual School Defendants and the Board's (together, "School Defendants") alleged violation of Smith's due process rights. It is this Section 1983 claim that the School Defendants now move to dismiss.

In support of his claim, Smith asserts the following alleged facts. On June 20, 2000, Weatherly informed Smith that he was being suspended with pay while Weatherly investigated the allegations of sexual harassment made by Kirkcaldy and another school employee, Sharon Renee Peek ("Peek"). Based upon the results of this investigation, on July 25, 2000, Weatherly changed Smith's suspension with pay to suspension without pay. Weatherly also informed Smith that a hearing before the Board regarding Smith's employment would be held in August of 2000. Weatherly further advised Smith that it would be recommended to the Board members that they terminate Smith from his position.

Prior to the Board hearing, which was held on August 24, 2000, Weatherly delivered to each Board member a copy of all the evidence he intended to present at the hearing against Smith. This evidence included references to polygraph examinations taken by Kirkcaldy and Peek. Smith asserts that this evidence was inadmissible at a school board hearing under North Carolina law. After reviewing the information provided to the Board members, including the references to the polygraph examinations, Myrtle Stogner, one of the Board members, allegedly made the statement to an unidentified individual that the case against Smith was "cut and dried" and that he would be dismissed for the alleged conduct.

At the August 24, 2000 hearing, Smith was allowed to present his evidence. Smith proffered fourteen affidavits from witnesses that rebutted the allegations of harassment made against Smith. Smith also submitted his medical records and his wife's affidavit demonstrating that he was impotent during the time period when the alleged harassment occurred, and therefore would have been physically unable to engage in some of the alleged misconduct. Smith requested a continuance of the hearing in order to obtain additional evidence concerning his impotence, but the Board denied his request.

At the conclusion of the August 24, 2000 hearing, the Board entered an order dismissing Smith from his position as principal. Smith appealed the Board's decision dismissing him to the North Carolina Superior Court, which affirmed the Board's decision. Smith then appealed the North Carolina Superior Court's decision to the North Carolina Court of Appeals. This court affirmed the Superior Court's decision, which upheld the Board's decision to dismiss Smith.

Smith's present cross-claim and third-party complaint filed pursuant to Section 1983 claims that the School Defendants violated his due process rights by denying him a fair hearing prior to his dismissal. In response, the School Defendants have filed the Motion to Dismiss now before the Court, asserting that dismissal of Smith's cross-claim and third-party complaint is proper pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim and Rule 12(b)(1) for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

II. DISCUSSION OF DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS

When a co-defendant asserts a cross-claim against a co-defendant, as Smith now asserts against the Board, the co-defendant's cross-claim must meet the requirements of Rule 13(g). In part, Rule 13(g) specifies that "a pleading may state as a cross-claim any claim against a co-party arising out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject of the original action or of a counterclaim therein." The Board asserts that Smith does not qualify for joinder because the cross-claim does not arise out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject of Kirkcaldy's suit, namely, the incidents of harassment that Kirkcaldy allegedly suffered, which ended on June 12, 2000. Rather, the Board maintains that the cause of action for a due process violation is based on the separate and different transaction or occurrence that involved the Board and Individual School Defendants' conduct in preparing and conducting the August 24, 2000 hearing that resulted in Smith's dismissal.

To determine whether Smith's cross-claim arises out of the same transaction and occurrence as Kirkcaldy's underlying claim, the Court refers to the Fourth Circuit case of Painter v. City of Falls Church, 840 F.2d 329 (4th Cir.1988), in which the Fourth Circuit addressed this question, albeit in the context of a different subsection of Rule 13. The Fourth Circuit in Painter explained how to determine if a defendant's claim was a compulsory counterclaim, as defined by Rule 13(a), when the claim was not asserted in the plaintiff's complaint. Like the Rule 13(g) cross-claim determination at issue in this case, the compulsory counterclaim determination under Rule 13(a) subject of this Court's inquiry, the compulsory counterclaim determination under Rule 13(a) hinges on whether the claims arise from the same "transaction and occurrence." In Painter, the Court finds that the Fourth Circuit's definition of the phrase "transaction and occurrence" under Rule 13(a) is directly relevant to the definition of the same term as used in Rule 13(g).

To determine if a cross-claim arose out of the same transaction or occurrence as the underlying claim, the Painter decision suggests conducting the following inquiries: (1) Are the issues of law raised in the complaint and cross-claim largely the same? (2) Will substantial evidence support or refute the complaint as well as the cross-claim? (3) Is there a relationship between the complaint and the cross-claim? In considering these questions, the Court is mindful that these inquiries are guidelines and that it "need not answer all questions in the affirmative" in order to find that the claims alleged in Kirkcaldy's Complaint and Smith's cross-claim arise from the same transaction and occurrence.

Turning now to the first inquiry, which considers the identity of the issues of law between the Complaint and the cross-claim, the Court recounts again that Kirkcaldy's Complaint alleges the following causes of action: sexual harassment during the period of April 1, 1999 and June 12, 2000 in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a), intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress, and a claim of negligent supervision, retention, and hiring against the Board. In comparison, Smith asserts in his cross-claim that the Board violated his property rights by terminating his employment and his reputation for honesty and morality when it terminated him without providing him with the due process required by law. More specifically, Smith asserts that his due process rights were violated because the Board members were biased against him.

could not serve as impartial decision-makers. Smith further asserts that Weatherly, prior to the hearing, improperly presented the Board members with evidence gathered against Smith. Finally, Smith also alleges that the evidence used by Weatherly wrongly included references to Kirkcaldy and Peek's polygraph results, which Smith alleges is prohibited by North Carolina law.

As the summary of the different counts asserted by Smith and Kirkcaldy demonstrate, Smith's Section 1983 claim against the Board and the Individual School Defendants does not involve the same questions of fact and law as Kirkcaldy's claims. With respect to the legal issues involved, Kirkcaldy's claims will focus on the legal questions of whether Smith engaged in conduct that qualified as sexual harassment and intentional or negligent infliction of emotional distress and whether the Board, as Smith's employer, should be held responsible for Smith's actions. Smith's claim, however, focuses on whether the Board violated his due process rights during his suspension hearing. The legal questions presented by Smith's claim therefore would overlap very little, if at all, with Kirkcaldy's claims. With respect to whether there are common questions of fact, Kirkcaldy's claims and Smith's claim again would diverge. While the factfinder in Kirkcaldy's action will be asked to determine whether Smith actually sexually harassed Kirkcaldy during her employment from July 20, 1999 through June 12, 2000, the factfinder for Smith's claims must decide whether the Board's actions at the August 24, 2000 hearing, based on the information known to the Board at that time, violated Smith's due process rights. Although it is true that the same persons might be witnesses in both cases, Smith and Kirkcaldy's use of these witnesses will differ because their questions will be focused on different periods of time and different legal theories. This inquiry therefore suggests that Kirkcaldy and Smith's claims are not part of the same transaction or occurrence.

The Court now turns to the second inquiry, which asks whether the same evidence can support both Kirkcaldy's claims and Smith's cross-claim. Again, the Court finds that this consideration counsels against joining Smith's cross-claim to the original lawsuit. As already mentioned, Smith's case will focus upon the Board's treatment of him during its investigation and at the August 24, 2000 hearing in order to demonstrate the alleged bias of the Board members and Weatherly. Smith's evidence, therefore, will likely include a reference to the evidence that Weatherly gathered against him in investigating Kirkcaldy's and Peek's claims. Smith, of course, would contend that this evidence was improperly presented to the Board members prior to the August 24, 2000 Board meeting so as to deny Smith due process. Kirkcaldy, on the other hand, will not utilize the evidence regarding the occurrences at and immediately prior to the August 24, 2000 Board meeting. Instead, Kirkcaldy's proof will focus on testimony and other evidence regarding Smith's allegedly harassing treatment of her during the period of July 20, 1999 through June 12, 2000. The lack of evidentiary overlap between these claims leads the Court to conclude that this inquiry also suggests that Smith's claim is not part of the same transaction and occurrence as Kirkcaldy's claims.

Although the first two inquiries suggest that Smith's claim does not rely on the same evidence, facts, or law as Kirkcaldy's claims and therefore the claims are not part of the same transaction or occurrence, the Court is cognizant that some cross-claims may still be part of the same transaction or occurrence as the underlying action " even though they do not involve a substantial identity of evidence with the claim." Accordingly, despite the Court's finding regarding the first two inquiries, Smith's claim could still be part of the same transaction or occurrence as Kirkcaldy's action if it satisfies the third inquiry by demonstrating that the claims alleged by Smith and Kirkcaldy possess a strong logical relationship to Kirkcaldy's action. The Court recognizes that the claims alleged by Smith and Kirkcaldy are necessarily related to some extent in a chronological way, because Kirkcaldy's claims of sexual harassment were part of the Board's decision to terminate Smith. However, the Court's analysis will focus on what occurred between her and Smith, and the extent that the claims of sexual harassment were part of the behavior or the potential of such behavior prior to its dismissal of Smith. The Court finds that Kirkcaldy's claims are logically attenuated from Smith's claims against the Board, which depends on the fact that the Board provided the necessary due process to Smith when they decided to terminate his position.

The weak logical relationship between these claims is demonstrated by the potential fact-finder might face if forced to hear the two cases together. Kirkcaldy's action would force the fact-finder to determine whether Smith sexually harassed Kirkcaldy. However, the fact-finder would need to switch its focus when considering Smith's cross-claim, for then the fact-finder must decide, regardless of whether Kirkcaldy's claims of sexual harassment were part of the Board's decision to terminate him, if the Board violated Smith's due process rights when it made its decision to terminate him. In light of the potential for confusion and given the different facts involved in Kirkcaldy's claims, the Court finds that the logical relationship between Kirkcaldy's Complaint and Smith's cross-claim is not strong enough to justify combining Smith's claims of due process with Kirkcaldy's claims of sexual harassment. The Court therefore concludes that Smith's cross-claim against the School Board is not part of the same transaction and occurrence as Kirkcaldy's claims, and therefore does not meet Rule 13(g)'s requirements.

Notwithstanding the Court's determination that Smith's cross-claim does not satisfy the requirements of Rule 13(g) because it does not arise from the same transaction or occurrence as Kirkcaldy's claims, Smith argues that his claim against the Board also qualifies for treatment as a permissive counterclaim that is authorized by Rule 13(b). Pursuant to Rule 13(b), "a party may state, as a counterclaim against an opposing party, any claim that is "not arising from the same transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party's claim." The parties to this case were originally co-defendants, and co-defendants do not qualify as opposing parties for the purposes of Rule 13(b). Smith argues, however, that when the Board brought its claim against Smith for indemnification and contribution, the Board became an opposing party to whom Smith may bring an unrelated claim. The success of Smith's argument thus turns on whether a cross-claim for indemnity by a co-defendant transforms the two co-defendants into opposing parties for whom the Rules regarding compulsory and permissive counterclaims apply.

Although the Federal Rules do not themselves address when a co-defendant becomes an opposing party, the majority of courts ruling on this issue have accepted the general rule that the term "opposing party" includes co-defendants once a substantive cross-claim is asserted against one co-defendant by the other. However, and particularly relevant to the case at hand, the Court notes that several courts have suggested that a co-defendant does not become an opposing party if the cross-claim asserted by the other co-defendant is merely a claim of indemnity or contribution, and not a substantive claim. Such a limitation is warranted because a cross-claim for indemnification and contribution "would not introduce new issues into the case, and could, in all likelihood, be litigated without substantially increasing the cost or complexity of the litigation."

finds that this analysis of when cross-defendants become opposing parties best furthers the purpose of the Federal Rules to “dispose of the entire subject matter arising from one set of facts in one action, thus administering complete and evenhanded justice expeditiously and economically.” Accordingly, as the Board’s cross-claim consists only of a claim for indemnification and contribution, the Court finds that the Board’s cross-claim does not provide Smith with the opposing party status needed pursuant to Rule 13(b) to assert a permissive counterclaim. Without such status, Smith’s claims against the School Board do not qualify for inclusion with the instant case pursuant to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Court shall therefore grant, without prejudice, the School Board’s Motion to dismiss Smith’s claims for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

5. Third-Party Claims

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 14

(a) When a Defending Party May Bring in a Third Party.

(1) Timing of the Summons and Complaint. A defending party may, as third-party plaintiff, serve a summons and complaint on a nonparty who is or may be liable to it for all or part of the claim against it. But the third-party plaintiff must, by motion, obtain the court’s leave if it files the third-party complaint more than 14 days after serving its original answer.

(2) Third-Party Defendant’s Claims and Defenses. The person served with the summons and third-party complaint—the “third-party defendant”:

(A) must assert any defense against the third-party plaintiff’s claim under Rule 12;

(B) must assert any counterclaim against the third-party plaintiff under Rule 13(a), and may assert any counterclaim against the third-party plaintiff under Rule 13(b) or any crossclaim against another third-party defendant under Rule 13(g);

(C) may assert against the plaintiff any defense that the third-party plaintiff has to the plaintiff’s claim; and

(D) may also assert against the plaintiff any claim arising out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the plaintiff’s claim against the third-party plaintiff.

(3) Plaintiff’s Claims Against a Third-Party Defendant. The plaintiff may assert against the third-party defendant any claim arising out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the plaintiff’s claim against the third-party plaintiff. The third-party defendant must then assert any defense under Rule 12 and any counterclaim under Rule 13(a), and may assert any counterclaim under Rule 13(b) or any crossclaim under Rule 13(g).

(4) Motion to Strike, Sever, or Try Separately. Any party may move to strike the claim, to sever it, or to try it separately.

(5) Third-Party Defendant's Claim Against a Nonparty. A third-party defendant under this rule against a nonparty who is or may be liable to the third-party defendant or part of any claim against it.

(b) When a Plaintiff May Bring in a Third Party. When a claim is asserted against a plaintiff may bring in a third party if this rule would allow a defendant to do so.

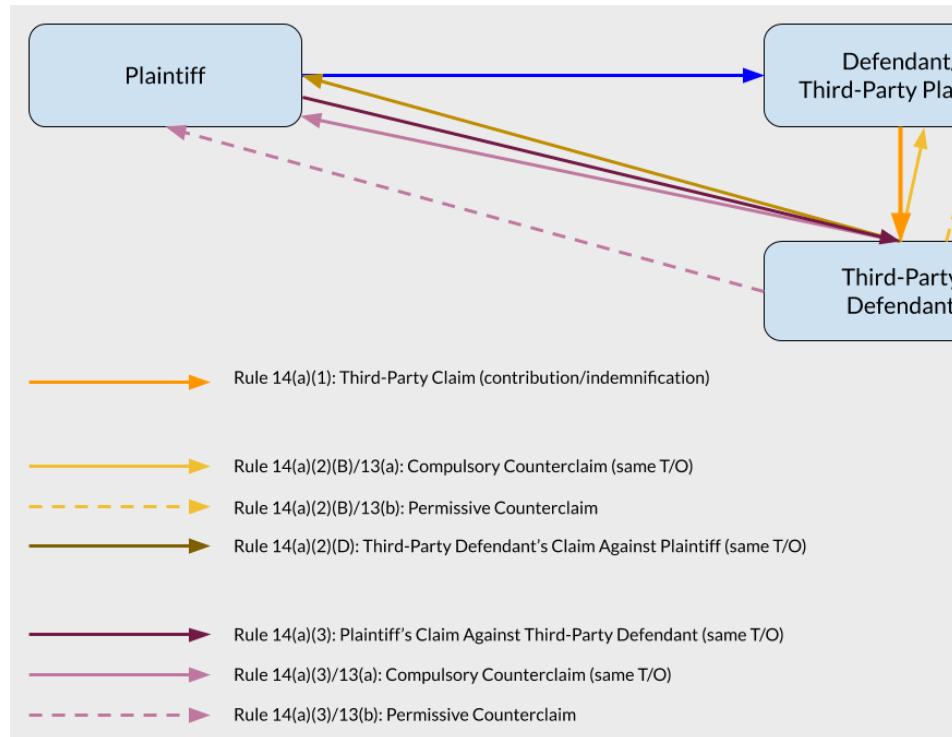

Fig. 2.1: Third Party Claims Under Rule 14

Contribution & Indemnification

FRCP Rules 13(g) and 14(a) both permit joinder of claims by a party seeking to hold someone else liable of a claim against them:

- Rule 13(g)

A crossclaim may include a claim that the coparty is or may be liable to the crossclaimant for all or part of the claim asserted in the action against the crossclaimant.

- Rule 14(a)

A defending party may, as third-party plaintiff, serve a summons and complaint on a nonparty who is or may be liable to it for all or part of the claim against it.

These provisions refer to claims for indemnification and contribution. They arise where a party to a suit (D1) seeks to hold someone else (D2) responsible for all (indemnification) or part (contribution) of the amount of a judgment against D1 in favor of another party (P1).

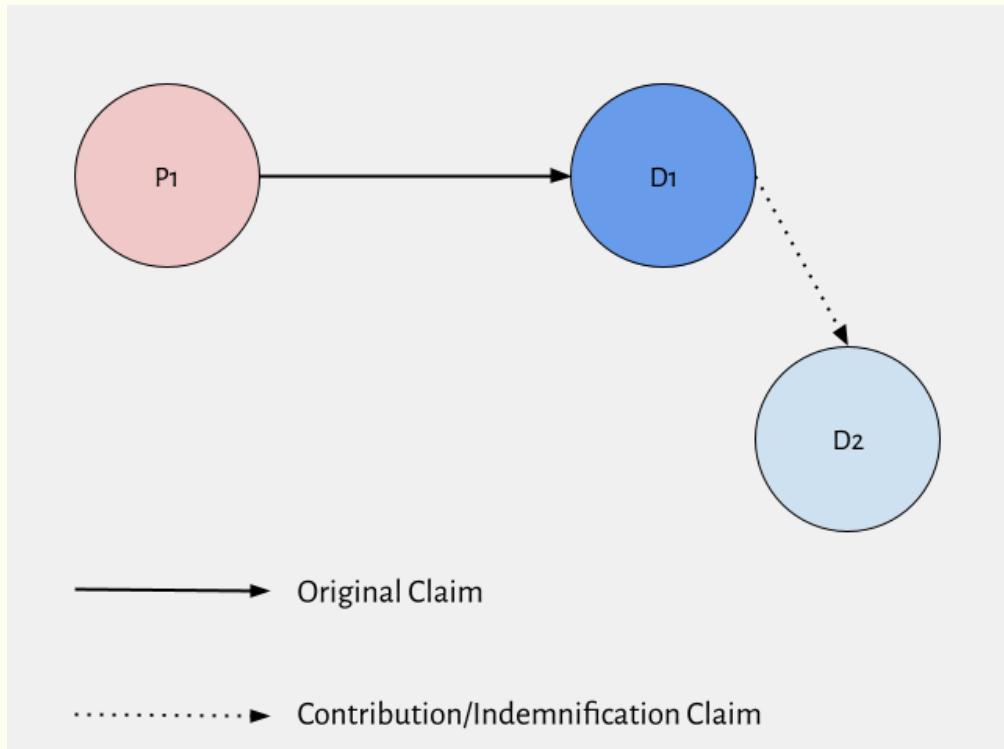

Fig. 2.2: Indemnification & Contribution

In Fig. 2.2, P1 asserts a claim against D1. D1 then asserts a claim against D2, contending that, if P1 prevails against D1, D2 must cover all or part of D1's liability to P1.

D2 may already be a party to the lawsuit (i.e. P1 has joined D2 as a co-defendant under Rule 20), in which case D2 would assert a crossclaim for indemnification or contribution under Rule 13(g). Or D2 may not yet be a party, in which case D1 would join D2 as a third-party defendant and assert a claim for indemnification or contribution under Rule 14(a).

D1's claim is functionally the same in either situation, but the FRCP uses different terminology depending on how D2 becomes a party. Under Rule 13(g), it is a cross-claim against a co-defendant; under Rule 14(a), it is a third-party claim against a third-party defendant. Understanding that distinction (and using the correct terms) is important, because it has other consequences under the FRCP: Rule 14 permits joinder of a third-party defendant only to assert a claim for indemnification or contribution on P's underlying claim, while Rule 13(g) would also permit crossclaims between D1 & D2 for their direct liability to each other arising from the same transaction or occurrence.

Under the FRCP, neither crossclaims nor third-party claims are compulsory. Consequently, a party with a potential contribution or indemnification claim (whether against a co-party or potential third-party) may opt to wait until the outcome of the suit and then bring the contribution/indemnification claim in a subsequent action.

Rules 13(g) and 14(a) do not establish a right to indemnification or contribution. That is a matter of substantive law (tort, contract, or statute). These Rules simply govern the procedure for joining such claims where they have some basis in substantive law.

Indemnification

A right to indemnification allows a defending party to recover the full amount of a judgment against (sometimes defense costs) from another person. Indemnification originated as a common law right, and agency law. The common law right has been augmented (or in some jurisdictions replaced) by contractual rights to indemnification.

Common Law Indemnification

Common law indemnification applies where a defendant was not actually at fault, but is liable to the other person's conduct, based on their legal status or relationship.

Example: At common law, if an employer was held vicariously liable for harm to a third party caused by the employer could sue the employee for indemnification. In some states, this common law right to indemnification from employees has been abrogated by judicial opinion or statute.

Example: In some states, if a retailer is subject to strict liability for injuries caused by a defective product, the retailer has a common law right to indemnification by the manufacturer or other party actually responsible for the defect, as long as the retailer was not itself also at fault.

Statutory Indemnification

Indemnification statutes may codify the common law right or impose a duty to indemnify where it would not otherwise exist under common law.

Example: In some states, an employer has a statutory duty to indemnify an employee for civil liability arising from the employee's actions in the course of employment. See, e.g., Cal. Labor Code § 2802.

Example: The business corporations statutes in every state include provisions permitting (subject to conditions or limits) corporations to indemnify corporate officers and directors (and sometimes other agents) who are sued based on their corporate roles. Some state's business corporations statutes provide for indemnification of officers and directors who successfully defend against such claims. See, e.g., 8 Del. C. § 141.

Contractual Indemnification

Parties may enter into agreements that shift ultimate responsibility for judgments, without regard to whether they were at fault.

Example: Many corporations enter into indemnification agreements with corporate officers and directors providing indemnification for liability arising out of their corporate roles (as authorized by statute).

Example: Manufacturers of consumer products may agree to indemnify distributors or retailers who are sued in liability suits. Such agreements may provide for indemnification where the common law right to indemnification does not apply or is not recognized at all under state law.

Liability insurance is a common type of contractual indemnification agreement. Such policies typically provide that the insurance carrier will pay (subject to limits and conditions in the policy) the cost of judgments and defense for claims covered by the policy. If there is a dispute as to whether the policy covers the potential liability, the insured party may join the insurance carrier as a third-party defendant so that they can resolve the coverage dispute.

Contribution

A right of contribution allows a joint tortfeasor who pays damages beyond their proportionate share of fault (e.g. under joint and several liability) to seek reimbursement from other joint tortfeasors for their proportionate shares. The right of contribution may be governed by common law or statute. You will learn more about joint & several liability, and contribution among joint tortfeasors, in your Torts class.

Lehman v. Revolution Portfolio, 166 F.3d 389 (1st Cir. 1999)

SELYA, Circuit Judge

This appeal grows out of a triangular 1987 financial transaction that involved the Farm Street Trust (the Trust), its beneficiaries (Barry Lehman and Stuart A. Roffman), and First Mutual Bank for Savings (the Bank). In the ensuing eleven years, the transaction imploded, litigation commenced, the Bank and Lehman became insolvent, parties came and went, and the case was closed and partially reopened. In the end, only a third-party complaint proved ripe for adjudication. Even then, the district court dismissed two of its three counts, but entered summary judgment on the remaining count. The third-party defendant, Roffman, now appeals. After sorting through the muddled record and the case's serpentine procedural history, we affirm.

I. BACKGROUND

The historical facts are not seriously disputed. On or about October 19, 1987, the Trust, acting through its trustee, executed a promissory note for $2,800,000 in favor of the Bank in order to fund the purchase of property in Dover, Massachusetts. Lehman and Roffman, each of whom enjoyed a 50% beneficial interest in the Trust, personally guaranteed the note, and Lehman proffered two parcels of real estate as additional collateral. In short order, the Trust defaulted on the loan and the Bank foreclosed on Lehman's properties. Lehman responded by suing the Bank seeking restraint or rescission of the imminent sale of his real estate. The gravamen of his suit was a claim that Roffman had fraudulently introduced a sham investor to the Bank in order to gull it into making the loan, and that the Bank, in swallowing this spurious bait hook, line, and sinker, had failed to exercise due diligence.

[The Bank failed and was placed in receivership. The FDIC, in its role as receiver, replaced the Bank as defendant and asserted a counterclaim against Lehman, as guarantor on the loan, to collect the outstanding balance owed. The FDIC also joined Roffman as a third-party defendant.]

The FDIC's third-party complaint contained three counts. The first two sought indemnification and contribution, respectively, in regard to the claims advanced by Lehman. The third sought judgment against Roffman, qua guarantor, for the outstanding loan balance.

[Roffman moved to strike the third-party complaint. The trial court denied that Roffman appealed. Meanwhile, Revolution Portfolio LLC (“RP”), to which the FDIC had interest in the Farm Street Trust debt, replaced the FDIC as the real party in interest.]

II. Discussion

We must answer the question whether the FDIC’s deployment of a third-party complaint against Roffman was proper. In this regard, Roffman asserts that the district court should have entertained the impleader, and that, therefore, the joined claim on the guaranty should have stood on its own weight. We review a district court’s decision to permit the filing of a third-party complaint under Fed.R.Civ.P. 14(a) for abuse of discretion.

As previously explained, the FDIC impleaded Roffman as a third-party defendant on claims for indemnification and contribution (counts 1 and 2, respectively), maintaining, in essence, that if the FDIC were found to be liable to Lehman, then Roffman would in turn be liable to hold it harmless. The FDIC asserted an independent claim for the outstanding loan balance, premised on Roffman’s guarantee of the debt. RP (which now stands in the FDIC’s shoes) acknowledges that the FDIC could not assert count 3 as a stand-alone third-party claim under Rule 14(a), but asserts that counts 1 and 2 should be joined with count 3 under Fed.R.Civ.P. 18(a) (providing for permissive joinder). In support of this thrust, Roffman contends that the FDIC’s claims for indemnification and contribution are not viable under state law, and thus, since the use of Rule 14(a) admittedly has no effect on the propriety of those claims, the FDIC should not have been allowed to implead him at all.

We conclude, without serious question, that the FDIC was entitled to implead Roffman under Rule 14(a) and that it appropriately joined the guaranty claim under Rule 18(a).

A defendant, acting as a third-party plaintiff, may implead any non-party “who is or may be liable to the third-party plaintiff for all or part of the plaintiff’s claim against the third-party defendant.” Fed.R.Civ.P. 14(a) (emphasis supplied). If the defendant acts within ten days of service of the summons and complaint, he may bring a third party into the suit without leave of court. Otherwise, permission must be obtained. In that event, the determination is left to the informed discretion of the district court, which should allow impleader on any colorable claim of derivative liability that will not unduly delay or otherwise prejudice the ongoing proceedings. Under this standard, a party accused of passive negligence (here, the FDIC) assuredly is entitled to implead the party who allegedly committed the relevant active conduct (here, Roffman) on a theory of indemnification.

The FDIC’s third-party claim for contribution against Roffman similarly passes muster. Roffman and the Bank (the FDIC’s predecessor in interest) were putative joint tortfeasors according to the complaint, Roffman’s fraudulent acts combined with the Bank’s omissions to create harm. See Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 231B, § 1(a) (1986) (providing for contribution among persons who are jointly liable in tort for the same injury).

To be sure, Roffman argues that because Lehman's complaint sought only restraint or rescission of the property sales, and not damages, a third-party claim for contribution should not lie. But this argument gains him no ground. Even though Lehman's complaint did not explicitly seek money damages, that omission did not eliminate the possibility that damages might be awarded to him. As long as damages may be awarded in lieu of rescission, impleader properly may be used to seek contribution toward those potential damages. It follows inexorably that the district court did not err in denying Roffman's motion to strike and allowing the FDIC's Rule 14(a) claims to stand.

Against this backdrop, the court properly assumed jurisdiction over count 3 of the third-party complaint. Rule 18(a) authorizes a third-party plaintiff to "join, either as independent or as alternative claims, as many claims, legal, equitable, or maritime, as the [third-party plaintiff] has against an opposing party." This authorization is subject only to the usual requirements of jurisdiction and venue (none of which are implicated here) and the district court's discretionary power to "direct an appropriate procedure for trying the claims.". Given Rule 18(a)'s broad expanse, misjoinder of claims has become an anachronism in federal civil practice.

In this instance, Roffman signed an unconditional personal guaranty of a loan, and the borrower later defaulted. As a holder in due course of the note, the FDIC had an independent claim for the outstanding balance against Roffman. There is absolutely no reason why the FDIC could not append its independent claim on the guaranty to its other claims against Roffman.

As a fallback position, Roffman suggests that the third-party complaint against him should have been dismissed because the FDIC had a complete defense under 12 U.S.C. § 1823(e) (1994) to the claims brought by Lehman. We do not agree. Even if section 1823(e) offered the FDIC a potentially strong defense against Lehman's claims, the record fails to show that the mere existence of that statute rendered Lehman's complaint a nullity.

There is, moreover, a broader point. A district court must oversee third-party practice with the core purpose of Rule 14(a) in mind: avoiding unnecessary duplication and circuitry of action. Requiring a district court to determine the merits of all defenses potentially available to the original defendant as a precondition to allowing that defendant to file a third-party complaint would frustrate this purpose and countervail the efficient allocation of judicial resources. Thus, as long as a third-party action falls within the general contours limned by Rule 14(a), does not contravene customary jurisdictional and venue requirements, and will not work unfair prejudice, a district court should not preclude its prosecution. So here.

Kirkcaldy v. Richmond County Bd. of Ed., 212 F.R.D. 289 (M.D.N.C. 2002)

BEATY, District Judge.

This case comes before the Court on Defendant Richmond County Board of Education and Third-party Defendants Bruce Stanback, Sandy Lampley, Herman Williams, Myrtle Stogner, Mary Carroll, Jackson Dawkins, Carlene Hill, and Larry K. Weatherly's ("Individual School Defendants") Motion to Dismiss Defendant Marcus Smith's ("Smith") Cross-claim and Third-party Complaint. For the reasons stated below, the Motion to Dismiss is hereby GRANTED.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Until August of 2000, Smith served as a principal of the Leak Street Alternative School, which was part of the Richmond County School System overseen by the Board. On September 14, 2000, Elizabeth Kirkcaldy ("Kirkcaldy"), who had worked as a secretary at the Leak Street Alternative School, filed a lawsuit against Smith and the Board. Kirkcaldy's Complaint alleges that from approximately July 20, 1999 to June 12, 2000, she was subjected to sexual harassment by her supervisor, Carlene Hill, who served as her direct supervisor during that time. Kirkcaldy claims that during this period, Smith repeatedly made unwelcome sexual contact with Kirkcaldy. Kirkcaldy also asserts that Smith frequently made comments of a sexual nature to her. Based on these facts, Kirkcaldy asserts the following claims: hostile work environment pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2(a); intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress against both the Board and the individual school defendants; and a claim for negligent supervision, retention and hiring against the Board.

In his Answer to Kirkcaldy's Complaint, Smith brings a cross-claim against the Board and the individual school defendants. Smith asserts a third-party complaint against the Superintendent of the Richmond County School System, Larry K. Weatherly ("Weatherly"), and Board members Bruce Stanback, Sandy Lampley, Herman Williams, Myrtle Stogner, Mary Carroll, Jackson Dawkins, and Carlene Hill, all in their personal and official capacities. Smith's claim against these Defendants is filed pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, based on the Individual School Defendants and the Board's (together, "School Defendants") alleged violation of Smith's due process rights. It is this Section 1983 claim that the Defendants now move to dismiss.

In support of his claim, Smith asserts the following alleged facts. On June 20, 2000, Weatherly informed Smith that he was being suspended with pay while Weatherly investigated allegations of sexual harassment made by Kirkcaldy and another school employee, Renee Peek ("Peek"). Based upon the results of this investigation, on July 25, 2000, Weatherly changed Smith's suspension with pay to suspension without pay. Weatherly also informed Smith that a hearing before the Board regarding Smith's employment would be held in August 2000. Weatherly further advised Smith that it would be recommended to the Board members to terminate Smith from his position.

Prior to the Board hearing, which was held on August 24, 2000, Weatherly delivered to each Board member a copy of all the evidence he intended to present at the hearing against Smith. This evidence included references to polygraph examinations taken by Kirkcaldy and Peek. Smith asserts that this evidence was inadmissible at a school board hearing under New York law. After reviewing the information provided to the Board members, including the results of the polygraph examinations, Myrtle Stogner, one of the Board members, allegedly made a statement to an unidentified individual that the case against Smith was "cut and dried" and that he would be dismissed for the alleged conduct.

At the August 24, 2000 hearing, Smith was allowed to present his evidence. Smith proffered fourteen affidavits from witnesses that rebutted the allegations of harassment made against Smith. Smith also submitted his medical records and his wife's affidavit demonstrating that he was impotent during the time period when the alleged harassment occurred, and therefore would have been physically unable to engage in some of the alleged misconduct. Smith requested a continuance of the hearing in order to obtain additional evidence concerning his impotence, but the Board denied his request.

At the conclusion of the August 24, 2000 hearing, the Board entered an order dismissing Smith from his position as principal. Smith appealed the Board's decision dismissing him to the North Carolina Superior Court, which affirmed the Board's decision. Smith then appealed the North Carolina Superior Court's decision to the North Carolina Court of Appeals. This court affirmed the Superior Court's decision, which upheld the Board's decision to dismiss Smith.

Smith's present cross-claim and third-party complaint filed pursuant to Section 1983 claims that the School Defendants violated his due process rights by denying him a fair hearing prior to his dismissal. In response, the School Defendants have filed the Motion to Dismiss now before the Court, asserting that dismissal of Smith's cross-claim and third-party complaint is proper pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim and Rule 12(b)(1) for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction.

II. DISCUSSION OF DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS

In addition to the Board's argument for dismissal of Smith's claim against it, the School Defendants' Motion to Dismiss also requests that the Court dismiss Smith's claim against the Individual School Defendants because Smith's third-party complaint does not satisfy the jurisdictional requirements of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. As the Individual School Defendants, unlike the School Board itself, were not parties to Kirkcaldy's original action, Smith's joinder of the Individual School Defendants must meet the requirements of one of the two Rules that allow the joinder of non-parties by a party defendant: Rule 14(a), which governs the impleader of non-parties as third-party defendants, or Rule 13(h), which governs the joinder of non-parties in certain other situations.

As Smith has characterized his claim against the Individual School Defendants as a third-party complaint, the Court will first consider whether Smith's claim satisfies Rule 14(a), the Rule that authorizes the addition of a third-party complaint to an action. Rule 14(a) allows a defendant to assert, as a third-party complaint, a claim against a person who is a non-party if that person is or may be liable to the defendant for part or all of the plaintiff's claims against him. Turning now to Smith's third-party complaint, the Court notes that it nowhere asserts that the Individual School Defendants are liable to him for any damages he might be responsible for due to Kirkcaldy's claims of sexual harassment. Instead, Smith asserts a Section 1983 claim based on the Individual School Defendants' actions regarding Smith's discharge. As Smith's Section 1983 claim is not based on the secondary or derivative liability of the Individual School Defendants, it cannot serve as the basis for a third-party complaint. The Court therefore must conclude that Smith has failed to satisfy Rule 14(a)'s requirements and cannot use this Rule as the basis to join his claim against the Individual School Defendants to Kirkcaldy's action.

In light of the Court's holding that Smith has not satisfied the third-party practice requirements of Rule 14(a), Smith's claim as alleged in his third-party complaint must be dismissed. Claims against the Individual School Defendants are authorized by Rule 13(h). Rule 13(h) allows a cross-defendant, when asserting a claim against another cross-defendant, to join to the cross-claim persons who are parties to the original action. It is important to underscore, however, that Rule 13(h) imposes a prerequisite that the cross-defendant first assert a claim against another cross-claimant. Smith cannot meet this prerequisite because of the Court's above decision dismissing his claim against the Board. As a result, Smith's Third-Party Complaint against the Individual School Defendants can satisfy neither Rule 14(a) nor Rule 13(h) and therefore must also be dismissed. Accordingly, the Motion to Dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction is GRANTED in favor of the Individual School Defendants as well as to the School Board.

6. Required Parties

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 19

(a) Persons Required to Be Joined if Feasible.

(1) Required Party. A person who is subject to service of process and whose joinder would deprive the court of subject-matter jurisdiction must be joined as a party if:

(A) in that person's absence, the court cannot accord complete relief among the existing parties; or

(B) that person claims an interest relating to the subject of the action and disposing of the action in the person's absence may:

(i) as a practical matter impair or impede the person's ability to protect that interest;

(ii) leave an existing party subject to a substantial risk of incurring double, multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations because of the interest.

(2) Joinder by Court Order. If a person has not been joined as required, the court may order that the person be made a party. A person who refuses to join as a plaintiff may be joined as a defendant or, in a proper case, an involuntary plaintiff.

(3) Venue. If a joined party objects to venue and the joinder would make venue inconvenient, the court must dismiss that party.

(b) When Joinder Is Not Feasible. If a person who is required to be joined if feasible cannot be joined, the court must determine whether, in equity and good conscience, the action should proceed among the existing parties or should be dismissed. The factors for the court to consider include:

- (1) the extent to which a judgment rendered in the person's absence might prejudice that person or the existing parties;
 - (2) the extent to which any prejudice could be lessened or avoided by:
 - (A) protective provisions in the judgment;
 - (B) shaping the relief; or
 - (C) other measures;
 - (3) whether a judgment rendered in the person's absence would be adequate; and
 - (4) whether the plaintiff would have an adequate remedy if the action were dismissed for nonjoinder.
- (c) Pleading the Reasons for Nonjoinder. When asserting a claim for relief, a party must state:
- (1) the name, if known, of any person who is required to be joined if feasible but is not joined; and
 - (2) the reasons for not joining that person.

Camacho v. Major League Baseball, 297 F.R.D. 457 (S.D. Cal. 2013)

LORENZ, District Judge

On November 30, 2012, Plaintiffs David Gonzalez Camacho and Daniel Arrellano Pesqueira commenced this tort action against multiple defendants. This action arises from allegations that Major League Baseball conspired with the Mexican Major Leagues to prevent baseball prospect Daniel Pesqueira from playing baseball in the United States. Pending before the Court is the Office of the Commissioner of Baseball (d/b/a Major League Baseball), Major League Baseball Enterprises, Inc., and Major League Baseball Properties, Inc.'s motion to dismiss pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(7). Plaintiffs oppose the motion.

The Court found this motion suitable for determination on the papers submitted and without oral argument. For the following reasons, the Court GRANTS Defendants' motion to dismiss.

I. Background [3]

Mr. Gonzalez is a citizen of Mexico, "who is domiciled and does business in the City of Tijuana in the country of Mexico, and who does business and resides in the County of San Diego, California, USA." He is and was "engaged in the training, support, promotion and representation of young talented and high caliber Mexican baseball players for eventual placement in international major and minor leagues, including Major and Minor League baseball conducted in the United States." Mr. Pesqueira is a citizen of Mexico who resides in Tijuana, Mexico.

^{3.} (n.3 in opinion) In the complaint, David Gonzalez Camacho is referred to as 'Gonzalez,' and Daniel Arrellano Pesqueira, who is also once mentioned as 'Daniel Pesqueira Arellano,' is referred to as 'young' [REDACTED]. The Court will follow the same naming convention, and refer to the plaintiffs as Mr. Gonzalez and Mr. Pesqueira.

On April 1, 2010, Mr. Gonzalez entered into an “Exclusive Agency Contract” with Plaintiff Pesqueira’s parents on behalf of Mr. Pesqueira, who was a minor at the time. Under the age of 18, Plaintiff Pesqueira provided Mr. Gonzalez with, among other things, the “exclusive right to negotiate and contract for Plaintiff Pesqueira in the negotiation for and contracting of any and all services of Plaintiff Pesqueira as a baseball player for any club in the major and/or minor leagues of any and all countries at any time.” Plaintiff Pesqueira agreed that Plaintiff Gonzalez would receive a 30% commission of Plaintiff Pesqueira’s compensation and all receipts and entitlements of Plaintiff Pesqueira for his services as a baseball player for Plaintiff Pesqueira during the term of the contract. Plaintiff Pesqueira also agreed that Plaintiff Gonzalez would be responsible for Plaintiff Pesqueira’s training and promotion. Plaintiff Pesqueira began to train and promote Plaintiff Pesqueira, which garnered the interest of talent scouts.

On February 17, 2012, the Boston Red Sox invited Plaintiff Pesqueira to train with the team in preparation for the 2012 season. Plaintiff Pesqueira accepted the invitation and began training in Fort Meyers, Florida. Then on March 6, 2012, a scout for the Boston Red Sox informed Plaintiff Pesqueira that Plaintiff Pesqueira would be returned to Mexico “based upon the direction of Major League Baseball” because Plaintiff Pesqueira “belonged to a Mexican league team and could not play in the major leagues without the consent of the Mexican league team.” Plaintiffs dispute the validity of this explanation, which they describe as a “completely false” premise. Major League Baseball also advised Plaintiff Pesqueira that Plaintiff Pesqueira “was and is on the reserve list of the Association of Professional Baseball Teams of the Mexican Leagues, therefore, he will not be able to play for the Boston Red Sox.”

At Plaintiff Pesqueira’s request, Major League Baseball forwarded a copy of the “two pages of documentation” between Plaintiff Pesqueira and the Mexican League team called the Leones del Escorial (“Red Devils”). Plaintiffs describe the documentation as containing “two preprinted forms, each prepared in Spanish,” without any contractual terms. One page—titled “Contract of Professional Services”—includes Plaintiff Pesqueira’s signature from January 1, 2010 with a start date of March 22, 2009, and a second page with the same title includes Plaintiff Pesqueira’s signature and with a start date of March 21, 2011. The former purportedly covers the 2009 Mexican baseball season, and the latter covers the 2011 season. Plaintiffs allege that at both times Plaintiff Pesqueira was under 18 years old, having been born on April 6, 1994. They also note that the earlier document bears Plaintiff Pesqueira’s father’s signature, though the later one does not.

According to Plaintiffs, Plaintiff Pesqueira and his father confirmed that they did not sign the documents provided by Major League Baseball. They believe that “either or both signatures of Plaintiff Pesqueira on each document has or have been fraudulently lifted from another document and transferred onto these documents, and that these documents are not authentic.”

Sometime thereafter, Plaintiff Gonzalez made a legal request to produce “any and all documents signed by Plaintiff Pesqueira, his parents or legal representatives binding him to Plaintiff Pesqueira to the Red Devils, to any other baseball team and/or to the Association of Professional Baseball Teams of the Mexican Leagues.” On February 23, 2011, the Association of Professional Baseball Teams of the Mexican Leagues timely complied, and produced a contract similar to the aforementioned ones. However, this contract contained a signature of Plaintiff Pesqueira from January 1, 2010 with a March 22, 2010 start date, covering the 2010 Mexican baseball season. Plaintiffs allege that Plaintiff Pesqueira’s signature on this contract is the “exact same signature as contained in the earlier documents meant to cover the 2009 baseball season.”

documents were also produced: a document “purported to be a Mexican Federal Institute of Elections ID Card of Alberto Pesqueira Corrales, the biological father of Pesqueira,” and a “purported copy of Pesqueira’s birth certificate.” Plaintiffs allege that no documentation was produced at the time pertaining to Mr. Pesqueira and the 2011 Mexican baseball season.

Plaintiffs continued their investigation. Either during or after the investigation, Mr. Gonzalez “encouraged and facilitated efforts of Major League Baseball to communicate and work with the Association of Professional Baseball Teams of the Mexican Leagues and the Red Devils of Mexico to verify that in fact Pesqueira was free to train and contract with the Boston Red Sox or any other team.” Plaintiffs allege that Major League Baseball did indeed communicate with the Mexican League and “confirmed that Pesqueira in fact was not committed to in any way, nor under contract with, the Association of Professional Baseball Teams of the Mexican Leagues and the Red Devils of Mexico.”

Plaintiffs commenced this action on November 30, 2012. They subsequently amended their complaint after it was dismissed without prejudice for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. They assert the following claims against all of the defendants for: (1) intentional interference with economic relations; (2) intentional interference with prospective economic advantage; (3) negligent interference with economic relations; (4) negligent interference with prospective economic relations; (5) declaratory relief; (6) negligence; and (7) unfair business practices. Defendants now move to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(7). Plaintiffs oppose.

II. Legal Standard

A party may move to dismiss a case for “failure to join a party under Rule 19.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(7). Rule 19 imposes a three-step inquiry: (1) Is the absent party necessary (i.e., required to be joined if feasible) under Rule 19(a)?; (2) If so, is it feasible to order that absent party to be joined?; and (3) If joinder is not feasible, can the case proceed without the absent party, or is the absent party indispensable such that the action must be dismissed? The terms “necessary” and “feasible” are “terms of art in Rule 19 jurisprudence”: “Necessary” refers to a party who should be joined if feasible; and “indispensable” refers to “a party whose participation is so important to the resolution of the case that, if the joinder of the party is not feasible, the suit must be dismissed.” The failure to join a party under Rule 19 can only lead to dismissal of a suit where the court cannot obtain jurisdiction over the necessary party and that party is determined to be indispensable to the action. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(a).

“The Ninth Circuit has held that a court should grant a 12(b)(7) motion to dismiss only if the court determines that joinder would destroy jurisdiction and the nonjoined party is necessary and indispensable.” “A motion to dismiss for failure to join an indispensable party requires the moving party to bear the burden in producing evidence in support of the motion.” “A Rule 12(b)(7) motion for failure to join an indispensable party demands a fact specific and practical inquiry.” “To determine whether Rule 19 requires the joinder of additional parties, the court may consider evidence outside the pleadings.”

III. Discussion

Defendants argue that both the Red Devils and the Mexican League are necessary parties to this action because they cannot be feasibly joined to this action because (1) a determination of the validity of Mr. Pesqueira's alleged contracts with the Red Devils is necessary, and (2) joining them would vitiate this Court's subject-matter jurisdiction and Plaintiffs cannot establish jurisdiction over these absent parties in this Court. Plaintiffs present their argument differently in their opposition brief compared to the allegations in the complaint. In their disingenuous early-inning strategic shift, they direct the focus of this action on Major League Baseball's agency contract with Mr. Pesqueira, arguing that the Red Devils and Mexican League are "tortfeasors" that are not necessary parties to litigate the claims asserted in this action. They swing for the fences, but ultimately come up short.

Upon reviewing the allegations in the complaint, it is clear that the threshold issue is the validity of the alleged contracts entered into between Mr. Pesqueira and the Red Devils. Plaintiffs proceed with their action under the presumption that those contracts are valid—because Mr. Pesqueira was a minor at the time the contracts were executed and the signatures were “fraudulently lifted from another document and transferred onto documents.” These allegations in the complaint overwhelmingly demonstrate that the focus of this action hinges on one game-winning issue—the validity of the Red Devils contract. Defendants' opposition brief emphasizes that determining the validity of the alleged contracts between Mr. Pesqueira and the Red Devils is outside the scope of this series. Therefore, the Court rejects the defendants' argument that Plaintiffs proceed with their action under the presumption that the shifted premise that Plaintiffs present in their opposition brief, and shall proceed with the Defendants' motion while recognizing that the validity of the alleged contracts between Mr. Pesqueira and the Red Devils is the go-ahead run.

A. The Red Devils and the Mexican League Are Necessary Parties

A party is necessary if: (1) complete relief cannot be granted in the party's absence, or (2) the district court determines that “the absent party's participation is necessary to protect the party's legally cognizable interests or to protect other parties from a substantial risk of incurring or incurring substantial risk of incurring or inconsistent obligations because of those interests.” Such a legally cognizable interest may be more than a financial stake in the outcome of the litigation. Defendants demand that the Red Devils and the Mexican League are necessary parties under the latter of the aforementioned definitions.

Under Rule 19(a)(1)(B)(i), an absent party is necessary if it “has a legally protected interest in the suit” and “that interest will be impaired or impeded by the suit.” “Impairment may be shown if the absent party is adequately represented in the suit.” Id. It is also a “fundamental principle of our law that ‘a party to a contract is necessary, and if not susceptible to joinder, indispensable to a suit in which the contract is involved.’” Id. Plaintiffs seek judicial determination of their rights and duties under the contracts between Mr. Pesqueira and the Red Devils. In the complaint, Plaintiffs express that they desire “a declaration as to whether or not Pesqueira is bound to the Red Devils by contract.” They even go as far as to state that a “judicial declaration is necessary and appropriate at this time under the circumstances” because without the declaration, they are burdened by the wrongful position taken by defendants Major League Baseball, a party to the contracts.

Plaintiffs unequivocally seek a judicial determination of their rights and duties under the contracts between Mr. Pesqueira and the Red Devils. In the complaint, Plaintiffs express that they desire “a declaration as to whether or not Pesqueira is bound to the Red Devils by contract.” They even go as far as to state that a “judicial declaration is necessary and appropriate at this time under the circumstances” because without the declaration, they are burdened by the wrongful position taken by defendants Major League Baseball, a party to the contracts.

work in their chosen professions.” In other words, determining the validity of the Red Devils contracts is necessary to resolve essentially all of the wrongful conduct alleged in this action. The same applies to the Mexican League because of its bylaws and regulations that require disputes between players and member teams to be resolved by binding arbitration before the Executive President of the Mexican League.

Neither the Red Devils nor the Mexican League are represented in this action, and a determination by this Court regarding the validity of the Red Devils contracts may impair and impede the Red Devils’ and the Mexican League’s legally protected interest in this suit. Keeping with the baseball theme, a batter cannot record a base hit or a home run against an absent pitcher; that pitcher needs to be in the game before that happens. In this circumstance, the absent pitchers are the Red Devils and the Mexican League. Therefore, as a party to the Red Devils contracts, the Red Devils, and by extension the Mexican League, are necessary parties.

Alternatively, under Rule 19(a)(1)(B)(ii), an absent party is also necessary if there is a potential risk that adjudicating an action without the absent party could leave an existing party open to “incurring double, multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 19(a)(1)(B)(ii). The Ninth Circuit has stated that “inconsistent obligations” are not the same as inconsistent adjudications or results. Inconsistent obligations occur when a party is unable to comply with one court’s order without breaching another court’s order concerning the same incident. Inconsistent adjudications or results, by contrast, occur when a defendant successfully defends a claim in one forum, yet loses on another claim arising from the same incident in another forum.

Defendants argue that “the Red Devils could still sue others in the Mexican courts and elsewhere for wrongfully interfering with its contract with Mr. Pesqueira,” and “this action will not have any binding effect on the Red Devils unless the team is made a party to this case.” (Defs.’ Mot. 11:10-19.) The concern that Defendants suggest is important, but for the purposes of Rule 19, the paramount concern is a Mexican court or another in the United States determining that the Red Devils contracts are valid if this Court finds that they are not, or vice versa. That would produce inconsistent obligations for all of the parties in this action in addition to the Red Devils because operating under one court’s determination would then necessarily cause the parties to breach another court’s determination regarding the same issue, i.e., the validity of the Red Devils contracts. Therefore, because of the risk of inconsistent obligations, the Red Devils are a necessary party to this action.

Swing and a miss—strike one.

B. Joining the Red Devils and the Mexican League Is Not Feasible.

“If an absentee is a necessary party under Rule 19(a), the second stage is for the court to determine whether it is feasible to order that the absentee be joined.” Rule 19(a) sets forth three circumstances in which joinder is not feasible: (1) when venue is improper; (2) when the absentee is not subject to personal jurisdiction; and (3) when joinder would destroy subject matter jurisdiction.

Defendants argue that “the Red Devils and the Mexican League cannot be joined their joinder would destroy this Court’s subject-matter jurisdiction, and because they cannot establish personal jurisdiction over them in this Court.” Plaintiffs do not argue feasibility in their opposition brief. In fact, the words “feasible” and “feasibility” do not appear anywhere in their brief. Consequently, Plaintiffs concede that joining the Red Devils and the Mexican League is not feasible under the second and third circumstances that Defendants enumerates. They took this pitch and it went right down the middle—strike two.

C. The Red Devils and Mexican League Are Indispensable Parties

If the necessary party cannot be joined, the court must then determine whether the absent party is indispensable. Under Rule 19(b), indispensable parties are “persons who are so interested in the controversy, but an interest of such a nature that a final decree cannot be rendered without either affecting that interest, or leaving the controversy in such a condition that its termination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience.” Rule 19(b) also lists the factors that courts should consider in determining if an action should be dismissed for lack of joinder of an absent party: (1) prejudice to any party or to the absent party if the action is dismissed; (2) whether relief can be shaped to lessen prejudice; (3) whether an adequate remedy, even if incomplete, can be awarded without the absent party; and (4) whether there exists an alternative procedure, such as an action to set aside a lease or a contract, all parties who may be affected by the decision of the action are indispensable.”

Plaintiffs’ primary arguments addressing indispensability are: (1) Defendants fail to establish that the Red Devils and the Mexican League are indispensable parties to the case burden, in part, because all of the cases cited are distinguishable, and (2) in equity and good conscience, this case should be allowed to proceed regardless of whether the Red Devils and the Mexican League are indispensable. The Court rejects these arguments. Plaintiffs either do not cite the cases relied upon, or they misinterpret the cited case law, and they also fail to provide any law that would support their position. Plaintiffs’ argument fails because there is no law that provides an avenue for this Court to bypass Rules 12(b)(7) and 19 and all of the related factors weigh in favor of dismissal. Plaintiffs’ argument fails because the law they cite does not support the position they implore the Court do.

Rather, in seeking a determination that the Red Devils contracts are invalid, Plaintiffs are attempting to do what they cannot do—dismiss the case. Plaintiffs are attempting to do what they cannot do—dismiss the case. And it is evident from the complaint that the Red Devils, as a party to the alleged contracts, and by extension the Mexican League, are parties that will be affected by any determination regarding the validity of the contracts. If Plaintiffs want to record an earned run against the absent pitchers, they need to face them. Thus, the Red Devils and the Mexican League are indispensable parties to the action. Consequently, all four of the Rule 19(b) factors weigh in favor of dismissal. Strike three—out.

7. Intervention

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 24

(a) Intervention of Right. On timely motion, the court must permit anyone to intervene who:

- (1) is given an unconditional right to intervene by a federal statute; or
- (2) claims an interest relating to the property or transaction that is the subject of the action, and is so situated that disposing of the action may as a practical matter impair or impede the movant's ability to protect its interest, unless existing parties adequately represent that interest.

(b) Permissive Intervention.

(1) In General. On timely motion, the court may permit anyone to intervene who:

- (A) is given a conditional right to intervene by a federal statute; or
- (B) has a claim or defense that shares with the main action a common question of law or fact.

(3) Delay or Prejudice. In exercising its discretion, the court must consider whether the intervention will unduly delay or prejudice the adjudication of the original parties' rights.

Buck v. Gordon, 959 F.3d 219 (6th Cir. 2020)

GRiffin, Circuit Judge.

The State of Michigan finds itself in a tug-of-war between faith-based child placement agencies and same-sex couples who wish to foster or adopt children. In an earlier round of litigation, appellants Kristy and Dana Dumont claimed the State violated their First and Fourteenth Amendment rights by allowing faith-based child placement agencies to refuse them service based on their sexual orientation. Michigan settled that suit by agreeing to enforce a policy prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation against faith-based child placement agencies. That settlement spawned this litigation. Plaintiff St. Vincent Catholic Charities claims the State violated its First and Fourteenth Amendment rights by directing it to perform its duties in a manner that violates its sincerely held religious beliefs.

This appeal deals not with the merits of the underlying constitutional dispute, but whether the district court erred as a matter of law in denying the Dumonts intervention as of right or, in the alternative, whether it abused its discretion in motion for permissive intervention. For the reasons explained below, we reverse court's order regarding permissive intervention and remand for further proceeding with this opinion.

A.

The Michigan Department of Health and Human Services (MDHHS) is responsible of more than 13,000 children within the state foster-care system due to abandonment. It has opted to contract out the majority of its fostering and adoption services to placing agencies (CPAs). The State presently licenses and holds contracts with n private CPAs.

Before becoming eligible as a foster or adoptive parent in Michigan, a person must license from the State. Private CPAs play a significant role in the licensing process by a home evaluation of the prospective parent(s). The home evaluation is “an exhaustive evaluation of the family’s eligibility” to act as foster or adoptive parents and requires the agency “the relationships between all of the adults living in the home.” It includes both subjective components and requires the CPA to make a final recommendation on whether the State should grant a license.

Some of the State’s contracted CPAs are faith-based organizations, including plaintiff Catholic Charities. Affiliated with the Catholic Diocese of Lansing, Michigan, St. Vincent is a Michigan non-profit corporation organized for charitable and religious purposes. It has provided foster care and adoption services for more than 70 years. St. Vincent shares the religious beliefs and teachings of the Roman Catholic Church regarding same-sex marriage. Therefore, it “cannot provide a written recommendation to the State evaluating and endorsing a same-sex couple to serve as foster parents because of the religious belief that such a situation that would conflict with its religious beliefs.” It thus refers out home evaluations of same-sex or unmarried couples to other CPAs that do not share its religious beliefs.

Historically, MDHHS permitted St. Vincent to refer out cases that could pose a threat to the agency’s sincerely held religious beliefs. And in 2015, the Michigan Legislature changed its laws to reflect this practice, enacting a statute designed to “ensure that faith-based child placing agencies can continue to provide adoption and foster care services” in line with their religious beliefs. The statute provides that “to the fullest extent permitted by state and federal law, a child placing agency may not be required to provide any services if those services conflict with, or provide services under circumstances that conflict with, the child placing agency’s sincerely held religious beliefs.”

B.

After Michigan enacted the 2015 Law, the Dumonts filed suit in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan (“the Dumont litigation”). They alleged that they were a same-sex couple interested in fostering and adoption, but that St. Vincent refused to assist them with the licensing process because of their sexual orientation. Based on this alleged discrimination, the Dumonts contended that MDHHS was violating their First and Fourteenth Amendment rights by permitting taxpayer-funded CPAs to use religious criteria to screen foster and adoptive parents.

St. Vincent successfully moved to intervene; indeed, the Dumonts did not oppose it. Both the MDHHS and St. Vincent then moved to dismiss the Dumonts’ complaint, with St. Vincent raising its own constitutional rights as affirmative defenses to the Dumonts’ claims. The district court denied both motions.

Michigan elected a new governor and a new attorney general in 2018. Thereafter, the State’s position in the litigation changed and the State ultimately entered into a settlement agreement with the Dumonts in March 2019. In exchange for the Dumonts dismissing their constitutional claims with prejudice, the MDHHS agreed that “unless prohibited by law or court order,” it would consider sexual-orientation discrimination by a faith-based child placement agency as violating the anti-discrimination clause under its existing contracts. St. Vincent was not included in the settlement discussions and is not a party to the agreement.

C.

St. Vincent commenced this lawsuit one month later in the United States District Court for the Western District of Michigan. It claimed that the State’s shift in policy violated its First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, along with the Religious Freedom Restoration Act. And it sought to enjoin the defendants from enforcing the State’s change in policy by terminating or suspending its contract.

The Dumonts moved to intervene before any defendant filed an answer and requested expedited consideration under the district court’s local rules. St. Vincent opposed the Dumonts’ motion. Agreeing with St. Vincent, the district court denied the motion. On mandatory intervention, the district court reasoned as follows:

The proposed intervenors rest their claim for intervention as of right on their interest in maintaining the Settlement Agreement. But that is an insufficient basis to support intervention as of right for at least two reasons. First, Plaintiffs are not asking for any relief directed at the Settlement Agreement itself. They do not seek to interpret its terms. Nor do they seek to invalidate any of its terms. From Plaintiffs’ point of view, the Settlement Agreement is beside the point and irrelevant to the constitutional and statutory claims asserted. Second, the State is fully capable of protecting any interest the Dumonts have in the terms of the Settlement Agreement in any event. The State Defendants and the Dumonts are fundamentally aligned at this time in not only their views of the Settlement Agreement, but also their views of the merits (or more accurately, the demerits) of Plaintiffs’ claims.

Regarding permissive intervention, the court observed:

It is possible to imagine a basis for permissive intervention if the interests of the State Defendants and the proposed intervenors diverge; or if the Court grants some or all of the preliminary relief Plaintiffs seek in a way that potentially affects the Dumonts in some way it does not affect the State Defendants; or if later developments in the case create a basis for defenses or counterclaims under Establishment Clause theories, for example — that may be uniquely available to the Dumonts.

Despite recognizing this common question of law, the district court concluded that the Dumonts and the State were “aligned in all material respects” and that the Dumonts’ “unique circumstances” could be made as amici, rather than as parties to the suit. Thus, the court denied the Dumonts’ motion to intervene without prejudice. The Dumonts then refiled their opposition to the motion for a preliminary injunction as an amicus brief in support of the defendants. The Dumonts filed this interlocutory appeal of the district court’s denial of their motion for intervention.

D.

Shortly after its rulings on the motion to intervene, the district court granted the Dumonts’ motion for a preliminary injunction. The State appealed the preliminary injunction to this Court. The State unsuccessfully sought a stay in our Court. It then changed course and moved to withdraw its appeal, which we granted. Back at the district court, St. Vincent moved to stay proceedings pending the Supreme Court’s decision in a case involving similar constitutional questions, Fulton v. City of Philadelphia. The district court granted the motion, reasoning that “Fulton will illuminate and shape the legal standards controlling this case and may be determinative.” Accordingly, the case has been stayed until the Supreme Court resolves the conflict.

II.

The only issues presented in this appeal are (1) whether the district court erred in denying the Dumonts’ timely motion to intervene as of right, and (2) whether the district court abused its discretion in denying the Dumonts’ permissive intervention. Because we hold that the Dumonts are entitled to permissive intervention, we address only those arguments.⁴

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 24(b)(1) provides that, “on timely motion, the court may allow anyone to intervene who has a claim or defense that shares with the main action a common question of law or fact.” In deciding whether to allow a party to intervene, “the court must consider whether the intervention will unduly delay or prejudice the adjudication of the parties’ rights.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 24(b)(3). “So long as the motion for intervention is timely filed and there is at least one common question of law or fact, the balancing of undue delay, pretrial expense to the original parties, and any other relevant factors is reviewed for an abuse of discretion.”

A.

Because the Dumonts timely moved to intervene,^[4] we first examine whether they have a common question of law or fact for resolution by the district court. They did.

⁴. (n.4 in opinion) There is no dispute that the Dumonts’ motion was timely; they filed their motion at the very outset of the suit, before any defendant had filed an answer. (In fact, the motion to intervene was filed more than five months prior to any defendant answering the suit.).

St. Vincent maintains that the First and Fourteenth Amendments guarantee it the right to refrain from certifying same-sex couples for adoption. The Dumonts' position is the inverse; they claim that the State may not allow St. Vincent to turn away same-sex couples without violating prospective foster or adoptive parents' First and Fourteenth Amendment rights. There can be only one winner in this clash of constitutional guarantees, so the Dumonts have presented a common question of law that can be resolved by the district court. Even the district court recognized this, indicating that pending unspecified "later developments," the Dumonts could present defenses or counterclaims which were "uniquely available" to them. Specifically, it highlighted the Dumonts' invocation of the Establishment Clause as a potential affirmative defense to St. Vincent's claims.

St. Vincent resists this conclusion by contending that the Dumonts "do not even allege a claim or defense common to this action" and raise only "Michigan's claims or defenses for it." The record says otherwise. The Dumonts have raised Establishment Clause and Equal Protection defenses that have not been asserted by the State.^[5]

Nor does Kirsch v. Dean support St. Vincent's no-common-ground-of-law position. There we discussed how permissive intervention is not appropriate where "a proposed intervenor submit[s] a filing that 'substantially mirrors the positions advanced' by one of the parties." We then held that the district court did not abuse its discretion by denying an untimely motion for intervention, where the sole basis was the proposed intervenor's desire to have opposing counsel disqualified for an alleged violation of the attorney-client privilege. There is no comparison to be drawn with Kirsch—the Dumonts asserted affirmative defenses the State forwent, while the Kirsch intervenors parroted the existing party's positions solely to have opposing counsel disqualified.

^{5.} (n.5 in opinion) We also note that when St. Vincent intervened into the Dumont litigation, it was in the exact position the Dumonts are now. In other words, if the Dumonts had raised "Michigan's claims or defenses for it," as St. Vincent then held, then the same was also true of its position in the prior case.

B.

Having determined that the Dumonts' motion was timely and that it presented a common question of law, we turn to the remaining factors in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 24(b)(3).

We begin with the risk of undue delay or prejudice to the existing parties. But this is precisely where the district court went astray; it made no apparent effort to weigh the benefits of resolving the common question of law presented by the Dumonts against the risk of undue delay or prejudice to the original parties. This failure constitutes an abuse of discretion.

A "district court operates within a 'zone of discretion' when deciding whether to allow intervention under Rule 24(b)." But that discretion has bounds—unless the basis for the decision is obvious from the record, the court must "provide enough of an explanation for its decision to enable us to conduct meaningful review." Here, the district court's departure from Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 24(b)'s "must consider" language leaves us with a "definite and firm conviction that the trial court committed a clear error of judgment" warranting reversal. And this is because the relevant factors weigh substantially in favor of permissive intervention.

Consider the benefits of resolving the legal question presented by the Dumonts' action as St. Vincent's claim. The core dispute between the Dumonts and St. Vincent has spawned at least three actions in federal district court, two appeals to our court, and now a petition for certification of a question to the Michigan Supreme Court. No case has yet reached final judgment on the merits. Absent intervention, these numbers are likely to increase, creating interest in judicial economy and desire to avoid multiplicity of litigation wherever possible. This possible therefore supports permissive intervention.

We also discern no danger of undue delay or prejudice to the existing parties that would result from allowing the Dumonts to intervene. We have already noted the benefits of having both sides of this constitutional dispute litigated in a single proceeding, now or, more importantly, at the time the Dumonts moved to intervene. Particularly, the case has already been stayed by the district court—on St. Vincent's motion—their intervention will not unduly prejudice St. Vincent. Nor do we find persuasive the speculation about protracted or unduly burdensome discovery if we allow the Dumonts to intervene. The Dumonts and St. Vincent have already engaged in substantial discovery in the Dumont litigation, cutting against a finding of undue delay or prejudice because the documents they have produced are relevant to the case brought by St. Vincent. Moreover, were the Dumonts to abuse their right to intervene, after being allowed to intervene, the district court could resolve the dispute as necessary under the dictates of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 26 and 37.

Two other unique aspects of this case support our decision to reverse the district court's denial of the Dumonts' motion to intervene. First, the district court's decision to deny the Dumonts' motion to intervene without prejudice and to allow its renewal is difficult to square with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 24(b). Timeliness of the motion is one of the primary factors. It makes little sense to require the Dumonts to file a timely motion to intervene, then to invite the Dumonts to renew their motion for intervention at some unspecified time in the future, when their motion will be less timely, and the case will have progressed further, where undue delay or prejudice to the existing parties is more probable. Second, the district court strayed too far from the legal standard set out in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 24(b) by treating the dispositive issue as whether the Dumonts' and the State defendants' interests are "aligned." To be sure, "we have recognized that identity of interest is one of several criteria" under Rule 24(b)." But as explained above, their interests are not completely aligned. Moreover, by analyzing the identity of interests, and not the risk of undue delay or prejudice to the existing parties, which plainly favored the Dumonts, the district court applied the wrong standard.

St. Vincent's remaining arguments are unconvincing. It asserts that because the district court had already allowed the Dumonts to participate in the litigation as amicus parties, it did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion. But there is more at stake for the Dumonts "than just the opportunity to present argument to the district court." The Dumonts also "desire[d] to have the opportunity to seek appellate review." We have already seen this play out, as the Dumonts argue that they would not have abandoned the appeal of the preliminary injunction if the State did. Thus, the Dumonts' participation in the case as amici does not shift the burden of proof.

Nor do we find persuasive St. Vincent's assertion that permitting the Dumonts to intervene will open the floodgates to all same-sex couples who may wish to intervene. Permissive intervention has always been a discretionary decision, dictated by the particular circumstances of the case. The district court retains broad discretion to exclude additional parties—even parties presenting common questions of law or fact—based on the totality of the circumstances.

District courts are afforded wide latitude to determine whether a party with a common question of law or fact may join a particular suit. But sometimes, a court steps outside its "zone of discretion," and thus abuses its discretion. This is just such a case. The Dumonts filed a timely motion to intervene which raised a common question of law that was not outweighed by any countervailing factors, warranting permissive intervention. We therefore hold only that based on the unique facts and circumstances of this case, the district court abused its discretion by providing a cursory explanation of its denial of permissive intervention, failing to address the relevant legal factors or the unique circumstances of the case, and denying the motion without prejudice to be revisited in the future. Upon remand, "the district court retains broad discretion in setting the precise scope of intervention" going forward.

SENTELLE, Senior Circuit Judge

In 2005, Amador County, California brought suit against the Department of Interior challenging the Secretary's approval of a gaming compact between the Buena Vista Rancheria of Me-Wuk Indians (the "Tribe") and the State of California. After nearly six-and-a-half years of litigation, the Tribe sought to intervene for the limited purpose of moving to dismiss the amended complaint under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19. The district court denied the motion as untimely, and this appeal followed. Because we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion, we affirm.

BACKGROUND

The Buena Vista Rancheria of Me-Wuk Indians is a federally recognized Indian tribe that occupies a 67-acre parcel of land located entirely within Amador County, California. In 1999, the Tribe negotiated a gaming compact with the State of California under the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act ("IGRA"), and submitted the compact to the Secretary of the Interior for approval. Under the IGRA, once the Tribe submits a gaming compact to the Secretary, the Secretary can either approve the compact; disapprove the compact, if it violates certain federal laws; or do nothing. If the Secretary does nothing, the compact is deemed approved after forty-five days. In 2000, the Secretary approved the compact. In 2004, the Tribe submitted an amended gaming compact to the Secretary. This time, the Secretary took no action on the amended compact for forty-five days, at which point the compact was deemed approved by operation of law.

In April 2005, Amador County challenged the Secretary's "no-action" approval of compact, arguing that the Tribe's land fails to qualify as "Indian lands"—a statutory for gaming under the IGRA. On July 22, 2005, Interior filed a motion to dismiss the that the County's claims were not subject to judicial review under the Administrative Act ("APA"). Shortly thereafter, the Tribe sought leave to participate in the case as amicus. The Tribe argued that the suit had to be dismissed under Rule 19 of the Federal Rules of Procedure because the Tribe was an indispensable party to the litigation, and thus protected by sovereign immunity so that the litigation could not proceed. The Tribe asserted that Interior did not adequately represent the Tribe's interests. The district court denied the Tribe's motion without explanation.

In 2008, while Interior's motion to dismiss was still pending, Amador County filed a complaint, and Interior again moved to dismiss. The district court granted Interior's finding that the Secretary's "no action" approval was "unreviewable," as the decision to approve a gaming compact is committed to agency discretion. Amador County appealed to the Ninth Circuit, which reversed.

Following this court's remand, the district court ordered the parties to file a Joint Status Report by November 7, 2011. Three days before the parties filed the Joint Status Report, the Tribe filed its motion to intervene. In June 2013, the district court denied as untimely the Tribe's motion to intervene, noting that the parties' Joint Status Report stated that the case is "ripe for argument and decision on the merits." The Tribe now appeals the district court's denial of its motion for intervention.

ANALYSIS

Intervention of right as sought by appellant is governed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 24. That rule provides:

- (a) Intervention of Right. On timely motion, the court must permit anyone to intervene who
 - (1) is given an unconditional right to intervene by a federal statute; or
 - (2) claims an interest relating to the property or transaction that is the subject of the action and is situated that disposing of the action may as a practical matter impair or impede the movant's ability to protect its interest, unless existing parties adequately represent that interest.

Under that rule, a district court must grant a motion to intervene if the motion is timely, the prospective intervenor claims a legally protected interest in the action, and the action does not impair that interest, unless that interest is adequately represented by existing parties. At the threshold, however, the motion to intervene must be timely. If the motion is filed late, the explicit language of the rule dictates that "intervention must be denied."

Timeliness “is to be judged in consideration of all the circumstances, especially weighing the factors of time elapsed since the inception of the suit, the purpose for which intervention is sought, the need for intervention as a means of preserving the applicant’s rights, and the probability of prejudice to those already parties in the case.” We review the district court’s denial of intervention for untimeliness under the abuse of discretion standard. A district court abuses its discretion when it applies the wrong legal standard or relies on clearly erroneous findings of fact.

In this case, after setting forth the timeliness test, the district court found that the Tribe’s motion for intervention was untimely. The district court found that the Tribe, from the outset of this litigation, both knew that the suit could adversely affect its rights, and questioned the adequacy of the United States’ representation. The district court reasoned that regardless of whether it measured the elapsed time from the time when the prospective intervenor “knew or should have known that any of its rights would be directly affected by the litigation,” or when the “potential inadequacy of representation came into existence,” timeliness weighs against the Tribe. The district court also considered the Tribe’s purpose for intervention, namely to file a Rule 19 motion, and noted that the Tribe’s need to intervene to maintain its sovereign immunity was a “significant factor” weighing in favor of allowing intervention. Lastly, the district court found that granting the Tribe’s motion will “further delay resolution of the merits to the detriment of the existing parties,” since the case was otherwise ready for a decision on the merits. Weighing all these factors, the district court found that the Tribe’s motion was untimely. Having considered “all the circumstances,” we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion.

Nevertheless, the Tribe offers multiple arguments for reversing the judgment. First, the Tribe asserts that the district court “undervalued” the Tribe’s purpose for intervention, that is, to seek dismissal of the action on the basis of the Tribe’s sovereign immunity. The Tribe, argues that because sovereign immunity is jurisdictional, or at least quasi-jurisdictional, the district court had a “heightened duty” to “weigh heavily” the Tribe’s purpose for intervention.

The Tribe’s argument fails. We have never held that a district court must give extra weight or special consideration to a sovereign’s purpose for intervention. We have held that a decision maker abuses its discretion if it fails to consider a relevant factor. Such is the holding of Acree, where this court reversed a district court’s finding of untimeliness because it “failed to weigh the purposes for which the Government sought to intervene.” In this case, the district court considered all the relevant factors, including the Tribe’s purpose for intervention, and we will not disturb its judgment.

Next, the Tribe argues that the district court abused its discretion by using the wrong date in computing the elapsed time. As the Tribe correctly notes, and as the district court acknowledged, courts measure elapsed time from when the “potential inadequacy of representation comes into existence.” The Tribe contends that a conflict of interest did not arise until 2011, when the government, in a separate but related proceeding, acknowledged that a Rule 19 defense was available but refused to assert it because of the United States’ interest in seeking a resolution to this case on the merits. Accordingly, the Tribe argues that the district court should have used 2011, instead of 2005, when weighing the elapsed time factor. We disagree.

Nothing changed in 2011 that warrants using that date in computing the elapsed time analysis. The Tribe, in the amicus curiae brief it proffered to the district court, argued that the Tribe was an indispensable party to the litigation, that the suit should be dismissed under Rule 19, and that the government's representation of the Tribe's interests may be inadequate. Thus, at the earliest, the Tribe and the government knew as early as 2005 that a Rule 19 defense was available. The government never asserted this defense, even though it had the opportunity to do so in its motion to dismiss. That record belies the notion that the Tribe could have expected adequate representation from the government after, but not before, 2011. Indeed, the Tribe argued as much by stating it had "earlier concerns about a potential conflict of interest with the United States' representation."

The Tribe seeks to avoid this conclusion by arguing that it was not until 2011 that its inadequate representation became a reality. Yet the Tribe argued in 2005 that "the problem is that the representation of the Tribe by the United States in this case does not fully protect the Tribe's interests." The record clearly shows that the Tribe knew in 2005 as well that the United States might not adequately represent the Tribe's interest. Therefore, the district court did not abuse its discretion in using the relevant date in its elapsed time analysis.

Lastly, the Tribe argues that even if the district court used the correct date in the elapsed time analysis, the district court erred because it treated the elapsed time analysis as dispositive. According to the Tribe, the district court conflated the elapsed time with the prejudice caused by focusing exclusively on the delay the motion for intervention will cause, instead of analyzing how the delay will prejudice the parties.

As we recently stated, the length of time passed "is not in itself the determinative factor for timeliness." Instead, the requirement is aimed primarily at preventing potential intervenors from unduly disrupting litigation to the unfair detriment of the existing parties. Accordingly, in assessing timeliness, a court must weigh whether the intervention will "unfairly disadvantage the original parties."

The district court in this case found that the case was ready for a decision on the merits, but that the Tribe's intervention would delay resolution of the merits. We have previously concluded that the delay caused by a potential intervenor was sufficient to constitute prejudice where the case on the merits was pending.

In this case, the County filed the complaint over nine years ago. In November 2010, the County and Interior agreed that the case was "ready for oral argument and decision on the merits." The Tribe's motion for intervention and the subsequent appeal have delayed a decision on the merits for three years. If the Tribe's motion were granted, a resolution of this case would be further delayed as the district court at the very least would need to accept briefing on the Rule 19 motion, hear argument, and rule on the motion. On such facts, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in finding that the Tribe's intervention would cause prejudice.

Because we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion on the question of timeliness, we need not reach the Tribe's argument that the United States did not adequately represent its interest.

RANDOLPH, Senior Circuit Judge, concurring

I agree that the Tribe's motion to intervene pursuant to Rule 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure was untimely. I write separately to mention another basis for denying the motion.

Under Rule 24(a)(2), the motion to intervene must not only be timely, but also the movant must claim an interest relating to the property or transaction that is the subject of the action, and be so situated that disposing of the action may as a practical matter impair or impede the movant's ability to protect its interest, unless existing parties adequately represent that interest.

Fed.R.Civ.P. 24(a)(2).

The Tribe wanted to intervene in order to assert that it was an indispensable party under Rule 19(a). The idea being that the Tribe could then invoke its sovereign immunity and have the court dismiss Amador County's action against the Department of the Interior. In terms of Rule 24(a)(2), the Tribe claimed that the United States did not "adequately represent" the Tribe's "interest"—which the Tribe defined as its sovereign immunity. Appellant's Brief at 46.

The strategy was clever but it would not have worked. The Tribe's interest in its sovereign immunity was not—in the words of Rule 24(a)(2)—"an interest relating to the property or transaction that is the subject of the action." The very point of the Tribe's motion was to inject sovereign immunity into the case. The Tribe therefore would not have qualified for intervention as of right even if it had timely filed its motion.

8. Interpleader

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 22

(a) Grounds.

(1) By a Plaintiff. Persons with claims that may expose a plaintiff to double or multiple liability may be joined as defendants and required to interplead. Joinder for interpleader is proper even though:

- (A) the claims of the several claimants, or the titles on which their claims depend, lack a common origin or are adverse and independent rather than identical; or
- (B) the plaintiff denies liability in whole or in part to any or all of the claimants.

(2) By a Defendant. A defendant exposed to similar liability may seek interpleader through a crossclaim or counterclaim.

(b) Relation to Other Rules and Statutes. This rule supplements—and does not limit—of parties allowed by Rule 20. The remedy this rule provides is in addition to—supersede or limit—the remedy provided by 28 U.S.C. §§1335, 1397, and 2361. An those statutes must be conducted under these rules.

28 U.S.C. § 1335

(a) The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action of interpleader nature of interpleader filed by any person, firm, or corporation, association, or society, his or its custody or possession money or property of the value of $500 or more, or having in his or her possession, or having in his or her power to dispose of, any note, bond, certificate, policy of insurance, or other instrument of value or amount more, or providing for the delivery or payment or the loan of money or property of or value, or being under any obligation written or unwritten to the amount of $500 or

(1) Two or more adverse claimants, of diverse citizenship as defined in subsection section 1332 of this title, are claiming or may claim to be entitled to such money or to any one or more of the benefits arising by virtue of any note, bond, certificate, or other instrument, or arising by virtue of any such obligation; and if (2) the claimants have deposited such money or property or has paid the amount of or the loan or other instrument or the amount due under such obligation into the registry of the court, or has abide the judgment of the court, or has given bond payable to the clerk of the court in the amount and with such surety as the court or judge may deem proper, conditioned compliance by the plaintiff with the future order or judgment of the court with respect to the subject matter of the controversy.

(b) Such an action may be entertained although the titles or claims of the conflicting claimants do not have a common origin, or are not identical, but are adverse to and independent of each other.

Rule and Statutory Interpleader

Rule 22 and 28 U.S.C. § 1335 provide two alternate ways of bringing an interpleader suit. Both involve the same basic concept of a dispute, where one party (the interpleader plaintiff) has possession of money or property in which two or more parties (the interpleader defendants) assert adverse claims of ownership or other legal interest.

But there are some procedural differences between rule interpleader and statutory interpleader (see Rule 22). A rule interpleader plaintiff may proceed under either Rule 22 or § 1335, provided they meet the applicable jurisdictional requirements and other requirements.

Deutsch v. Schoelkopf, No. 3:16-CV-05561-RBL (W.D. Wash. 2016)

LEIGHTON, District Judge

This matter is before the Court on Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Plaintiff Deutsch's Interpleader Action. Deutsch is currently in possession of a valuable sculpture and seeks equitable relief to determine ownership of the artwork. Defendants seek dismissal claiming an Interpleader Action is improper because the complaint fails to name two or more adverse claimants and this Court does not otherwise have jurisdiction.

Background

Deutsch seeks to interplead a sculpture—Industrial Forms (aka Auto Tower)—by well known American artist John Storrs. She received the sculpture from the estate of her father who previously owned an art gallery in New York City. The ownership history of sculpture, while somewhat circuitous, is relevant to the motion.

The sculpture was one of several related pieces by Storrs, two of which are in the National Gallery of Art.

"late 1970s" appears to be a clerical error. The Complaint indicates that the consignment was made in 1969.

Auto Tower, Industrial Forms, John Storrs (ca. 1922)

In the late 1970s, John Storrs' estate (represented by his daughter, Monique) consigned Industrial Forms to the Robert Schoelkopf Gallery in New York City. The Gallery maintained a long-term business relationship with the Storrs estate through selling several of the artist's works.

In the summer of 1977, the Schoelkopf Gallery sent a letter to Monique Storrs Booz indicating that Industrial Forms had been stolen. Schoelkopf enclosed payment for $2,250, the amount he would have received had the sculpture been sold (list price minus gallery commission). The sculpture was submitted to the Smithsonian Archives of American Art for preservation by the Smithsonian Institution. The Smithsonian Archives of American Art held the sculpture at the 1990 National Gallery show Industrial Forms labeled as "stolen." In 1991, Robert Schoelkopf passed away. The Schoelkopf Gallery closed, and Andrew Schoelkopf—Robert's son—assumed control of the Gallery's outstanding art interests.

Deutsch's father owned the Sid Deutsch Gallery in New York City. He passed away in 2008. Monique Storrs Booz inherited the sculpture from her father's estate and returned to Washington, D.C. Several years later, Deutsch contacted Valerie Carberry in an attempt to value the sculpture. Carberry is a partner at the Richard Gray Gallery in Chicago that managed the Storrs estate. Carberry notified Michelle Storrs Booz, the last remaining heir of the Storrs estate, of Deutsch's sale inquiry. The pair concluded the sculpture went missing from the Richard Gray Gallery and that Andrew Schoelkopf was the true owner by virtue of Robert's 1977 sale to him. Monique Storrs Booz.

In October 2015, Carberry wrote a letter to Deutsch on behalf of the Storrs Estate expressing that the sculpture had been previously been stolen and the Storrs Booz family wished to return the sculpture to the proper owners. Andrew sent Deutsch a letter confirming that Storrs Booz had agreed that he owns Industrial Forms, and to make arrangements for its retrieval. In January 2016, Deutsch filed a complaint against the Storrs Booz family and brought this interpleader against the named defendants to resolve what should be done with the competing interests. Deutsch claims she is the rightful owner of Industrial Forms because the letter from Carberry is not conclusive proof that it was stolen.

Discussion

A. Standard of Review

Interpleader is a procedure authorized by 28 U.S.C. §§ 1335 and Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 22 that allows a party holding property to join in a single suit two or more defendants asserting mutually exclusive claims to the property. The main purpose of interpleader is to protect the stakeholder from the expenses of multiple lawsuits and from having to deal with inconsistent or multiple determinations of liability. While rule and statutory interpleader has different requirements for subject matter jurisdiction, venue, process service, in that the type requires meeting certain criteria.

First, multiple adverse claims or potential adverse claims must be made to that same property. Additionally, the plaintiff stakeholder must have a reasonable fear of multiple liability. The stakeholder is not required to determine the validity of the competing claims or wait to be actually sued by one or more of the claimants. However, the stakeholder must have “a good faith belief that there are or may be colorable competing claims to the stake,” based on “a real and reasonable belief.”

An interpleader action proceeds in two stages. In the first stage, a court evaluates whether interpleader is proper based on the facts of the case, including determining whether the stakeholder actually faces or could face multiple adverse claims. If interpleader is not properly invoked, the action is dismissed. If (and only if) an interpleader is determined to be proper does a court move to the second stage to determine the merits of the adverse claims.

During the first phase, the party seeking interpleader bears the burden of demonstrating she is or may be subject to adverse claims. Adverse claims or potentially adverse claims exist when at least two defendants lay claim to the property held by the stakeholder. Sustaining an interpleader based on potential claims requires a “real and reasonable belief” that the interpleaded parties could have a colorable claim to the stake.

B. Deutsch has not shown sufficient adverse claims to invoke interpleader.

Deutsch's interpleader action necessarily depends on her claim that all of the named defendants possess adverse claims to the sculpture. But only Andrew Schoelkopf claims any interest in Industrial Forms—the other defendants all agree that Andrew is the only legitimate claimant, and each affirmatively renounces any claim. This leaves Andrew as the only actual claimant to the sculpture. Deutsch cannot maintain her interpleader action based on current adverse claims.

Without presently adverse claims to the sculpture, the next issue is whether Deutsch can establish potentially adverse claimants. The potential claimants with a reasonable claim to the sculpture have submitted declarations to this Court. Michelle Storrs Booz, the Schoelkopf family, and Valerie Carberry reflect the parties known to have a potentially colorable claim to the sculpture that could be potentially adverse to Deutsch. Following John Storrs Booz's 2005 death, his sister, Michelle Storrs Booz is the sole John Storrs heir with any remaining interest in the sculpture according to her declaration. She renounced any claim to the sculpture on behalf of her father's estate. Andrew, Jane, and Robert J. Schoelkopf—Robert Schoelkopf's heirs—all agree that Andrew is the only family member with a claim to the sculpture. Jane and Robert J. explicitly renounce any claim to the sculpture. Additionally, Valerie Carberry, the Chicago-based art dealer from the Richard Gray Gallery, makes no claim to the sculpture.

Michelle Storrs Booz is the sole remaining heir of Storr's artwork. She has renounced any interest in the sculpture, and that precludes any potential future claim from the Storr's family. Similarly, Jane and Robert J.'s disavowal precludes any potential future claim from the Schoelkops. Carberry and the Gray Gallery renounce any future claim to the statute. Therefore, Deutsch cannot sustain the interpleader action based on potential adverse claimants.

In an effort to save her interpleader claim in the face of overwhelming evidence that one actual or potential claimant, Deutsch next argues interpleader is proper based on adversity at the time she filed this complaint. Once interpleader jurisdiction has been established it will continue even if the original claimants are no longer adverse. As noted above, jurisdiction must first be properly established before it will continue in adverse parties. Here, no adverse claims are present at the outset, therefore no jurisdiction. Deutsch filed her initial complaint on June 24, 2016. On May 17, 2017, Schoelkopf notified her in writing that the Storrs estate agreed he was the legitimate owner of the sculpture. At the outset of this action defendants all submitted declarations attesting to the lack of adversity before the court ruled on the existence of interpleader jurisdiction. Deutsch cannot maintain her interpleader claim based on perceived adversity at the time she filed her claim.

Therefore, defendants' motion is GRANTED and plaintiff's complaint and request for judgment are DISMISSED without prejudice.

Meyer v. Anderson, No. 2:19-cv-640-DCN (D.S.C., filed Dec. 14, 2019)

NORTON, District Judge

I. Background

Defendants formed an attorney-client relationship with Meyer in 2014. Anderson is the managing partner of JAA, a law firm that Meyer claims to have been retained by who own and operates JAA. Without providing any additional context beyond her allegations, Meyer claims that defendants "chose to invent, fabricate, and publicize, false and derogatory information about Meyer, falsely purporting to claim knowledge of Meyer to do so." Defendants allegedly did so without Meyer's permission "without a proper investigation." Meyer explicitly states that the allegedly false information was not repeated in the complaint, but that defendants' statements containing the false information were made under oath and in public documents. Meyer then alleges that in 2017, she was publicly attacked based on the false information spread by defendants. Meyer does not allege that she was publicly attacked or by whom. When Meyer realized that the source of the false information was defendants, she alleged asked defendants about their conduct, and defendants denied making any false or derogatory statements about Meyer. Meyer "responded to Anderson's denial by confronting him about having lied to her" and sought more information from the statements, but defendants did not respond to Meyer. Meyer alleges that after defendants' spreading false information about her, Meyer was forced to "compromise at a deep discount rather than run the risk of trying her cases" when allegedly defendants previously believed that Meyer's cases "were each seven figure cases."

Meyer brought claims against defendants for breach of fiduciary duty and negligence and against JAA for aiding and abetting breach of fiduciary duty. Meyer also filed an interpleader claim against defendants. Pursuant to the interpleader claim, defendants filed a motion to deposit funds and restrain defendants.

II. Discussion

A. Motion to Deposit Funds and Restrain Defendants

According to Meyer, defendants are claiming a fee interest in Meyer's personal litigation to which they are not entitled based on the conduct alleged in this case. Meyer's current counsel holds in his trust account the fee to which defendants claim interest, and Meyer wants the court to hold these funds and prevent their distribution to defendants until this case is resolved. As such, Meyer asks the court to enter an order (1) authorizing the clerk of court to accept the contested funds that will be under control of the court pending the court's determination of the parties' rights and obligations pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1335, and (2) restraining defendants from instituting any proceeding affecting the funds involved in this suit pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2361.

Defendants provide further context to Meyer's request in their response. They explain that when Meyer hired defendants to represent her, the parties entered into a contingency fee agreement. During Meyer's litigation, one of JAA's former attorneys, Gregg Meyers ("Meyers"), left JAA, and Meyer independently retained him as her counsel. Meyers is also Meyer's counsel in this case. Pursuant to Minnesota and South Carolina settlement agreements, defendants and Meyers allegedly agreed to equally split any fees earned during the representation of Meyer. However, Meyer has only paid legal fees to Meyers and not to defendants. Defendants argue that Meyer is simply seeking to avoid paying defendants and is not entitled to her requested interpleader relief because this is not a proper interpleader action. Specifically, they argue that this is not a proper interpleader action because: (1) there is no risk of inconsistent judgments or multiple litigation over the funds; (2) there are not two or more diverse, adverse claimants to the funds; and (3) Meyer is not in control of the funds. Defendants also argue that Meyer is not entitled to the injunctive relief under § 2361 because she has not brought a proper interpleader action.

"Interpleader is a procedural device that allows a disinterested stakeholder to bring a single action joining two or more adverse claimants to a single fund." It "is an equitable remedy designed to protect the stakeholder from multiple, inconsistent judgments and to relieve it of the obligation of determining which claimant is entitled to the fund." Interpleaders are used when multiple parties claim stake in a single fund, and the party in control of the fund asks the court to retain control of the fund while the court determines which party is entitled to the fund.

There are two types of interpleader: statutory and rule-based. A statutory interpleader exists pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1335, which provides that:

(a) The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action of interpleader or in the nature of interpleader filed by any person, firm, or corporation, association, or society having in his or its custody or possession money or property of the value of $500 or more if

(1) Two or more adverse claimants, of diverse citizenship as defined in subsection (a) or (d) of section 1332 of this title, are claiming or may claim to be entitled to such money or property; and if (2) the plaintiff has deposited such money or property into the registry of the court, there to abide the judgment of the court, conditioned upon the compliance by the plaintiff with the future order or judgment of the court with respect to the subject matter of the controversy.

(b) Such an action may be entertained although the titles or claims of the conflicting claims do not have a common origin, or are not identical, but are adverse to and independent of one another.

Rule 22 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure also allows interpleader, permitting “two or more claims that may expose a plaintiff to double or multiple liability” to “be joined as defendants required to interplead.” Rule 22 goes on to clarify that “joinder for interpleader is proper even though the claims of several claimants lack common origin or are adverse.” Here, Meyer has established an interpleader action under both § 1335 and Rule 22. The statute and Rule 22 meet the jurisdictional requirements but not in substance.” Therefore, the substantive requirements for interpleader, namely, a risk of multiple or inconsistent judgments and adverse claims, are the same under § 1335 and Rule 22.

The factual scenario presented in this case is not one that meets the requirements for interpleader. First, Meyer is not at risk for multiple or inconsistent judgments. The party claiming right to Meyer’s funds are defendants. The only other party involved in this case could be entitled to the funds is Meyer’s current counsel, Meyers, but Meyer clarifies that her counsel has no claim to the funds. Therefore, either defendants are entitled to the funds or Meyers is, and there are not, leaving no opportunity for multiple or inconsistent judgments. Moreover, the two parties are not multiple, adverse parties that are claiming a right to Meyer’s funds. While Meyer has named multiple defendants here, Anderson is the owner of JAA. Therefore, Anderson and JAA are not adverse parties.

In addition, a statutory interpleader also requires that the multiple, adverse claimants be diverse. Here, the two named defendants are Anderson and JAA. Even if they were not citizens of the same state, both parties are citizens of Minnesota; therefore, they are not diverse. In this case, Meyer has not pleaded a proper interpleader action under § 1335 or Rule 22.

Because Meyer has not properly brought an interpleader action, she is not entitled to relief that restrains defendants from bringing an action related to the funds. In an interpleader action, a district court may “enter its order restraining claimants from instituting or prosecuting a proceeding in any State or United States court affecting the property in the interpleader action until further order of the court.” 28 U.S.C. § 2361. Because this action is not a proper interpleader action, the court cannot grant this relief.

In response to defendants’ arguments, Meyer only states that “defendants are simply not adverse parties to the funds because they do not have competing claims to the funds to be interpleaded, and are properly restrained from initiating competing claims against the court.” Meyer does not substantively argue how she has properly pleaded an interpleader action, nor does she cite to any case law in support of her motion. Meyer briefly mentions that her counsel cannot disburse the fund without her approval, citing to Rule 1.5 of the Model Rules of Professional Responsibility; however, any ethical obligations belonging to Meyer’s counsel have no role in the court’s determination of whether Meyer has properly pleaded an interpleader action. Therefore, the court denies Meyer’s motion to transfer funds and restrain defendants from bringing an action related to the funds.

9. Review Questions

Mrs. Claypool, an aspiring society matron, hears that the director of the New York Opera Company, Herman Gottlieb, is seeking a patron. Claypool believes this is a perfect way to enhance her standing in society. She hires Otis Driftwood to act as her agent in negotiating a deal with Gottlieb, under which Claypool will donate $500,000 to the Opera Company so it can hire Rodolfo Lassparri, the greatest tenor in the world. In exchange, Gottlieb agrees to name the Opera House after Claypool.

Driftwood goes to meet Lassparri, intending to sign him to a contract with the Opera Company to close the deal between Claypool & Gottlieb. Along the way, he meets Fiorello, a genial con artist, who tricks Driftwood into signing Lassparri's rival, Baroni, instead. When Gottlieb discovers what has happened, he renegs on his agreement to name the Opera House after Claypool.

A furious Claypool sues Gottlieb for breach of contract, seeking restitution of the $500,000 she donated to the Opera Company. She also sues Driftwood for breach of contract & fraud over his role in the failure of the Opera Company deal, seeking $50,000 (the amount she paid Driftwood for his services as her agent) plus punitive damages. Claypool brings her suit in federal court (assume that the court would have personal jurisdiction over all parties and subject matter jurisdiction over all claims).

Part A

1. Is joinder of Gottlieb and Driftwood as defendants proper under the FRCP?
2. Assume that Claypool sues only Gottlieb. Gottlieb's defense is that his promise to name the Opera House after Claypool was contingent upon signing Lassparri to a contract with the Opera Company, and that Driftwood's failure to fulfill that part of the deal means that Gottlieb is not contractually obligated to honor his promise to Claypool. Is Driftwood a person required to be joined if feasible under the FRCP?
3. Assume instead that Claypool sues only Driftwood. May Gottlieb intervene as a plaintiff to assert a claim against Driftwood for failure to sign Lassparri to a contract with the Opera Company?

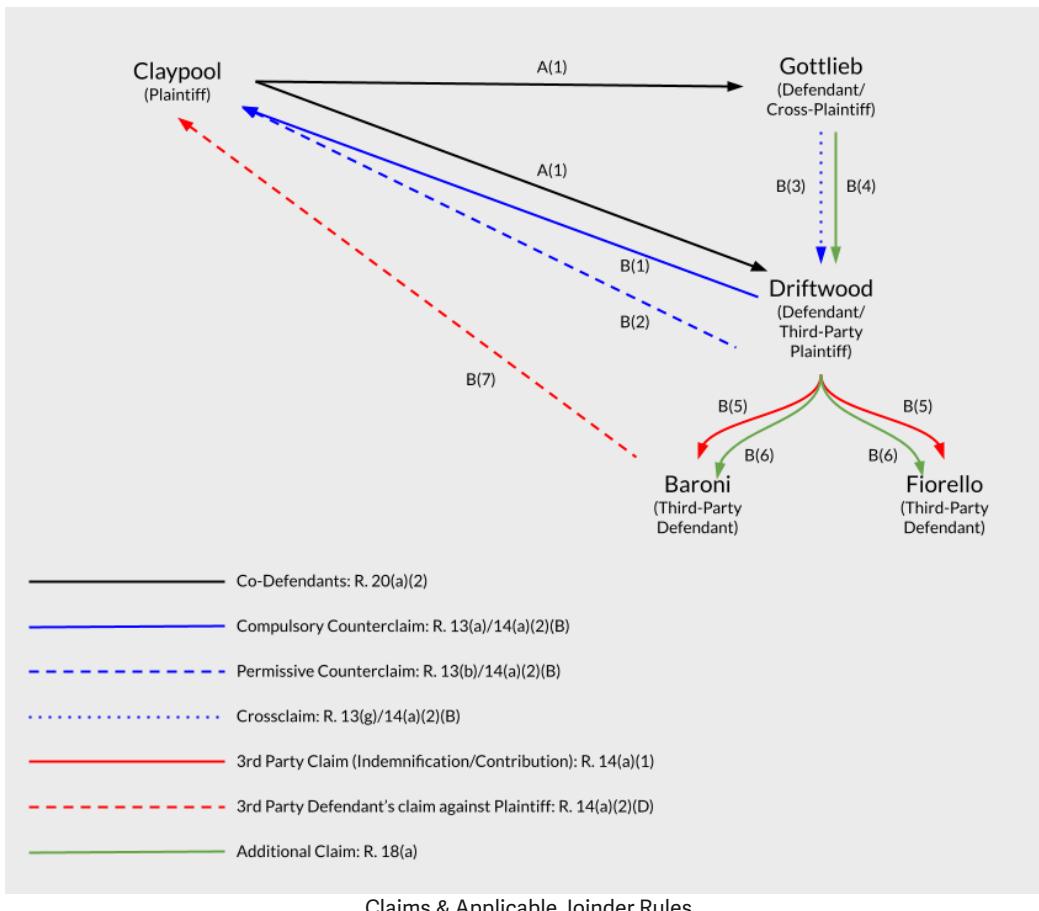

Part B

Assume that Claypool sued both Gottlieb & Driftwood and that their joinder as co-defendants was proper under the FRCP.

For each of the following additional claims, explain whether joinder is proper under the FRCP:

1. A claim by Driftwood against Claypool for breach of contract, seeking $25,000 he contends she still owes him for his services under their contract.

2. A claim by Driftwood against Claypool for battery, alleging that she poured a bowl of hot coffee over his head when he clumsily attempted to woo her during a party to celebrate the ill-fated Opera contract.
3. A claim by Gottlieb against Driftwood, alleging that the Opera Company lost 50% of its season ticket sales because of the failure to sign Lassparri.
4. A claim by Gottlieb against Driftwood for breach of contract in an unrelated business venture in which Driftwood was to supply the Opera Company with costumes.
5. A claim by Driftwood against Fiorello and Baroni, asserting that if Driftwood is found liable for his conduct or Gottlieb for his failure to sign Lassparri, Fiorello and Baroni must cover all or part of Driftwood's expenses. Driftwood is ordered to pay Claypool or Gottlieb, because it was their fault Driftwood signed Lassparri.
6. A claim by Driftwood against Fiorello and Baroni, seeking $25,000 against them, jointly and severally, for defrauding him into signing Baroni to the Opera contract. The $25,000 represents the amount Driftwood expected to earn by signing Lassparri.
7. A claim by Baroni against Driftwood for failure to pay Baroni in accordance with the terms of the contract Driftwood signed.

No person shall ... be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law;

Amendment XIV, sec. 1

... nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law;

1.1 Foundations

Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714 (1877)

MR. JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action to recover the possession of a tract of land, of the alleged value of $15,000, situated in the State of Oregon. The plaintiff asserts title to the premises by a patent of the United States issued to him in 1866, under the act of Congress of Sept. 27, 1850, usually known as the Donation Law of Oregon. The defendant claims to have acquired the premises under a sheriff's deed, made upon a sale of the property on execution issued upon a judgment recovered against the plaintiff in one of the circuit courts of the State. The case turns upon the validity of this judgment.

It appears from the record that the judgment was rendered in February, 1866, in favor of J.H. Mitchell, for less than $300, including costs, in an action brought by him upon a demand for services as an attorney; that, at the time the action was commenced and the judgment rendered, the defendant therein, the plaintiff here, was a non-resident of the State; that he was not personally served with process, and did not appear therein; and that the judgment was entered upon his default in not answering the complaint, upon a constructive service of summons by publication.

The Code of Oregon provides for such service when an action is brought against a non-resident and absent defendant, who has property within the State. It also provides, where the plaintiff can show that he is entitled to the recovery of money or damages, for the attachment of the property of the non-resident defendant. The statute further declares that no natural person is subject to the jurisdiction of a court of the State if he appear in the court, or be found within the State, or be a resident thereof, or have his permanent home therein; and, in the last case, only to the extent of such property at the time the judgment was attached." Construing this latter provision to mean, that, in an action for money, where a defendant does not appear in the court, and is not found within the State, or is not a resident thereof, but has property therein, the jurisdiction of the court extends only to the property, the declaration expresses a principle of general, if not universal, law. The jurisdiction of every tribunal is necessarily restricted by the territorial limits of the State in which it is established. Any attempt to exercise authority beyond those limits would be deemed a usurpation of power, or a mere abuse. In the case against the plaintiff, the property here in controversy so far as it concerned him, was not attached, nor in any way brought under the jurisdiction of the court. Its first connection with the case was caused by a levy of the execution. It was not attached, nor disposed of pursuant to any adjudication, but only in enforcement of a personal judgment having no relation to the property, rendered against a non-resident without serving the process upon him in the action, or his appearance therein. The court below did not consider that the judgment was invalid from defects in the affidavit upon which the order of attachment of the property was based, or from the manner in which the publication was obtained, and in the affidavit by which the publication was proved.

The Supreme Court held that a challenge to the form of the affidavit could only be raised on a direct appeal, not a collateral attack.

"In-rem jurisdiction refers to the power of a court over an item of real or personal property. The "thing" over which the court has power may be a piece of land or even a marriage. Thus, a court with only in-rem jurisdiction may terminate a marriage or declare who owns a piece of land. In-rem jurisdiction is based on the location of the property and enforcement follows property rather than person." Wex Legal Dictionary.

It was also contended in that court, and is insisted upon here, that the judgment of the circuit court against the plaintiff was void for want of personal service of process on him, and that his non-appearance in the action in which it was rendered, and that the premises in controversy were not subjected to the payment of the demand of a resident creditor except by a proceeding in rem; that is, by a direct proceeding against the property for that purpose. If these principles are sound, the ruling of the Circuit Court as to the invalidity of that judgment must stand notwithstanding our dissent from the reasons upon which it was made. And that this result would seem to follow from two well-established principles of public law respecting the jurisdiction of an independent State over persons and property. The several States are not, it is true, in every respect independent, many of the rights and powers which belonged to them being now vested in the government created by the Constitution; but as restrained and limited by that instrument, they possess and exercise the powers of independent States, and the principles of public law to which we have referred apply to them. One of these principles is, that every State possesses exclusive jurisdiction over persons and property within its territory. As a consequence, every State has the power to determine for itself the civil status and capacities of its inhabitants; to regulate the contracts and subjects upon which they may contract, the forms and solemnities with which they shall be executed, the rights and obligations arising from them, and the mode in which their validity shall be determined and their obligations enforced; and also to regulate the conditions upon which property situated within such territory, both personal and real, is acquired, enjoyed, and transferred. The other principle of public law referred to follows one mentioned; that is, that no State can exercise direct jurisdiction and authority over property without its territory. The several States are of equal dignity and authority.

independence of one implies the exclusion of power from all others. And so it is laid down by jurists, as an elementary principle, that the laws of one State have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as is allowed by comity; and that no tribunal established by it can extend its process beyond that territory so as to subject either persons or property to its decisions.

But as contracts made in one State may be enforceable only in another State, and property may be held by non-residents, the exercise of the jurisdiction which every State is admitted to possess over persons and property within its own territory will often affect persons and property without it. To any influence exerted in this way by a State affecting persons resident or property situated elsewhere, no objection can be justly taken; whilst any direct exertion of authority upon them, in an attempt to give ex-territorial operation to its laws, or to enforce an ex-territorial jurisdiction by its tribunals, would be deemed an encroachment upon the independence of the State in which the persons are domiciled or the property is situated, and be resisted as usurpation.

Thus the State, through its tribunals, may compel persons domiciled within its limits to execute, in pursuance of their contracts respecting property elsewhere situated, instruments in such form and with such solemnities as to transfer the title, so far as such formalities can be complied with; and the exercise of this jurisdiction in no manner interferes with the supreme control over the property by the State within which it is situated.

So the State, through its tribunals, may subject property situated within its limits owned by non-residents to the payment of the demand of its own citizens against them; and the exercise of this jurisdiction in no respect infringes upon the sovereignty of the State where the owners are domiciled. Every State owes protection to its own citizens; and, when non-residents deal with them, it is a legitimate and just exercise of authority to hold and appropriate any property owned by such non-residents to satisfy the claims of its citizens. It is in virtue of the State's jurisdiction over the property of the non-resident situated within its limits that its tribunals can inquire into that non-resident's obligations to its own citizens, and the inquiry can then be carried only to the extent necessary to control the disposition of the property. If the non-resident have no property in the State, there is nothing upon which the tribunals can adjudicate.

If, without personal service, judgments in personam, obtained ex parte against non-residents and absent parties, upon mere publication of process, which, in the great majority of cases, would never be seen by the parties interested, could be upheld and enforced, they would be the constant instruments of fraud and oppression. Judgments for all sorts of claims upon contracts and for torts, real or pretended, would be thus obtained, under which property would be seized, when the evidence of the transactions upon which they were founded, if they ever had any existence, had perished.

"In personam refers to courts' power to adjudicate matters directed against a party, as distinguished from in rem proceedings over discrete property." Wex Legal Dictionary.

"In civil procedure, ex parte is used to refer to motions for orders that can be granted without waiting for a response from the other side. Generally, these are orders that are only in place until further hearings can be held, such as a temporary restraining order."

Substituted service by publication, or in any other authorized form, may be sufficient to inform parties of the object of proceedings taken where property is once brought under the control of the court by seizure or some equivalent act. The law assumes that property is always in the possession of its owner, in person or by agent; and it proceeds upon the theory that its seizure will inform him, not only that it is taken into the custody of the court, but that he must look to any proceedings authorized by law upon such seizure for its condemnation and sale. Such service may also be sufficient in cases where the object of the action is to reach and dispose of property in the State, or of some interest therein, by enforcing a contract or a lien

"Initially a court will be hesitant to make an ex parte motion. This is because the Fifth Amendment and the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee a right to due process, and ex parte motions—due to their exclusion of one party—risk violating the excluded party's right to due process." Wex Legal Dictionary.

The want of authority of the tribunals of a State to adjudicate upon the obligations of non-residents, where they have no property within its limits, is not denied by the court because it is assumed, that, where they have property within the State, it is immaterial whether the property is in the first instance brought under the control of the court by a proceeding in some other equivalent act, and afterwards applied by its judgment to the satisfaction of the plaintiff against its owner; or such demands be first established in a personal action, and the judgment of the court to collect from the non-resident be afterwards seized and sold on execution. But the answer to this question has already been given in the statement, that the jurisdiction of the court to inquire into the property of a non-resident to determine his obligations at all is only incidental to its jurisdiction over the person. The jurisdiction in that respect cannot be made to depend upon facts to be ascertained before the trial of the cause and rendered the judgment. If the judgment be previously void, it will remain so notwithstanding the subsequent discovery of property of the defendant, or by his subsequent confession of it. The judgment if void when rendered, will always remain void: it cannot occupy the position of being valid if property be found, and void if there be none. Even if the jurisdiction were confined to cases where the non-resident defendant possessed property in the State at the commencement of the action, it would still make the validity of the process depend upon the question whether, before the levy of the execution, the defendant had or had not disposed of the property. If before the levy the property should be found according to this position, the judgment would not be binding. This doctrine would introduce a new element of uncertainty in judicial proceedings. The contrary is the law: the validity of a judgment depends upon the jurisdiction of the court before it is rendered, not upon the facts which may occur subsequently.

The force and effect of judgments rendered against non-residents without personal process upon them, or their voluntary appearance, have been the subject of consideration in the courts of the United States and of the several States, as attempts made to enforce such judgments in States other than those in which they were rendered, violate the provision of the Constitution requiring that "full faith and credit shall be given to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State;" and the acts providing for the mode of authenticating such acts, records, and proceedings, and defining when thus authenticated, "they shall have such faith and credit given to them in every State within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the State from which they are or shall be taken." In the earlier cases, it was supposed that the act gave to all judgments the same effect in other States which they had by law in the State where rendered.

was afterwards qualified so as to make the act applicable only when the court rendering the judgment had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, and not to preclude an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment was rendered, or the right of the State itself to exercise authority over the person or the subject-matter.

Be that as it may, the courts of the United States are not required to give effect to judgments of this character when any right is claimed under them. Whilst they are not foreign tribunals in their relations to the State courts, they are tribunals of a different sovereignty, exercising a distinct and independent jurisdiction, and are bound to give to the judgments of the State courts only the same faith and credit which the courts of another State are bound to give to them.

Since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, the validity of such judgments may be directly questioned, and their enforcement in the State resisted, on the ground that proceedings in a court of justice to determine the personal rights and obligations of parties over whom that court has no jurisdiction do not constitute due process of law. Whatever difficulty may be experienced in giving to those terms a definition which will embrace every permissible exertion of power affecting private rights, and exclude such as is forbidden, there can be no doubt of their meaning when applied to judicial proceedings. They then mean a course of legal proceedings according to those rules and principles which have been established in our systems of jurisprudence for the protection and enforcement of private rights. To give such proceedings any validity, there must be a tribunal competent by its constitution—that is, by the law of its creation—to pass upon the subject-matter of the suit; and, if that involves merely a determination of the personal liability of the defendant, he must be brought within its jurisdiction by service of process within the State, or his voluntary appearance.

Except in cases affecting the personal status of the plaintiff, and cases in which that mode of service may be considered to have been assented to in advance, as hereinafter mentioned, the substituted service of process by publication, allowed by the law of Oregon and by similar laws in other States, where actions are brought against non-residents, is effectual only where, in connection with process against the person for commencing the action, property in the State is brought under the control of the court, and subjected to its disposition by process adapted to that purpose, or where the judgment is sought as a means of reaching such property or affecting some interest therein; in other words, where the action is in the nature of a proceeding in rem.

It is true that, in a strict sense, a proceeding in rem is one taken directly against property, and has for its object the disposition of the property, without reference to the title of individual claimants; but, in a larger and more general sense, the terms are applied to actions between parties, where the direct object is to reach and dispose of property owned by them, or of some interest therein. Such are cases commenced by attachment against the property of debtors, or instituted to partition real estate, foreclose a mortgage, or enforce a lien. So far as they affect property in the State, they are substantially proceedings in rem in the broader sense which we have mentioned.

In an omitted portion of the opinion, the Court notes some limits to its holding. In suits "to determine the civil status and capacities of" state residents (e.g. divorce cases) judgments may bind non-residents even "without personal service of process or personal notice". States may also require that non-residents appoint in-state agents to receive service, or consent to alternative forms of service, "in cases involving business dealings or contracts within the state."

It follows from the views expressed that the personal judgment recovered in the State of Oregon against the plaintiff herein, then a non-resident of the State, was without authority and did not authorize a sale of the property in controversy.

The Donation Land Claims Act of 1850 was instrumental in the settlement of the Pacific Northwest. Under the act, white male U.S. citizens could claim 320 acres of land (640 acres for a married couple) in the Oregon Territory. The act also encompassed the present-day States of Washington and Idaho, along with parts of Montana and Wyoming. The act gave legal imprimatur to the dispossessor of Native people from their lands, and bolstered white supremacy in the territory, which had already enacted legislation excluding Black people.

John H. Mitchell and Sylvester Pennoyer were significant and colorful political figures in Oregon. International Shoe Corp. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945)

Chief Justice STONE delivered the opinion of the Court

The questions for decision are (1) whether, within the limitations of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, appellant, a Delaware corporation, has by its activities in the State of Washington rendered itself amenable to proceedings in the courts of that state to require it to make contributions to the state unemployment compensation fund exacted by state statute; and (2) whether the state can exact those contributions consistently with the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In this case notice of assessment for unpaid contributions for the years in question was personally served upon a sales solicitor employed by appellant in the State of Washington. A copy of the notice was mailed by registered mail to appellant at its address in St. Louis. Appellant appeared specially before the office of unemployment and moved to set aside the service and notice of assessment on the ground that the service upon appellant's sales solicitor was not a proper service upon appellant; that appellant was not a corporation of the State of Washington and was not doing business within the state; that it had no agent within the state to whom service could be made; and that appellant is not an employer and does not furnish employment within the meaning of the statute.

International Shoe Co., St. Louis, Missouri

The facts as found by the appeal tribunal and accepted by the state Superior Court and Supreme Court, are not in dispute. Appellant is a Delaware corporation, having its principal place of business in St. Louis, Missouri, and is engaged in the manufacture and sale of shoes and other footwear. It maintains places of business in several states, other than Washington, at which its manufacturing is carried on and from which its merchandise is distributed interstate through several sales units or branches located outside the State of Washington.

Appellant has no office in Washington and makes no contracts either for sale or purchase of merchandise there. It maintains no stock of merchandise in that state and makes there no deliveries of goods in intrastate commerce. During the years from 1937 to 1940, now in question, appellant employed eleven to thirteen salesmen under direct supervision and control of sales managers located in St. Louis. These salesmen resided in Washington; their principal activities were confined to that state; and they were compensated by commissions based upon the amount of their sales. The commissions for each year totaled more than $31,000. Appellant supplies its salesmen with a line of samples, each consisting of one shoe of a pair, which they display to prospective purchasers. On occasion they rent permanent sample rooms, for exhibiting samples, in business buildings, or rent rooms in hotels or business buildings temporarily for that purpose. The cost of such rentals is reimbursed by appellant.

F.O.B. ("free on board") is a commercial law term indicating the point at which responsibility for goods shifts from the seller to the buyer. In this case, International Shoe shipped its shoes "F.O.B. Origin", meaning it was no longer responsible for the shoes once they left the point of shipment outside Washington. The company relied on this legal formality to contend it engaged in no activity within Washington.

The authority of the salesmen is limited to exhibiting their samples and soliciting prospective buyers, at prices and on terms fixed by appellant. The salesmen transact to appellant's office in St. Louis for acceptance or rejection, and when accepted the order for filling the orders is shipped f.o.b. from points outside Washington to the purchaser in the state. All the merchandise shipped into Washington is invoiced at the place from which collections are made. No salesman has authority to enter into contracts for collections.

Historically the jurisdiction of courts to render judgment in personam is grounded in fact power over the defendant's person. Hence his presence within the territorial jurisdiction of a court was prerequisite to its rendition of a judgment personally binding him. Perry v. Ladd, 95 U.S. 714, 733. But due process requires only that in order to subject a defendant to a judgment in personam, if he be not present within the territory of the forum, he have certain contacts with it such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice."

Since the corporate personality is a fiction, although a fiction intended to be a fact, though it were a fact, it is clear that unlike an individual its "presence" without, as well as within, the state of its origin can be manifested only by activities carried on in its behalf. Those who are authorized to act for it. To say that the corporation is so far "present" there as to satisfy the requirements of due process, for purposes of taxation or the maintenance of suits against it in the courts of the state, is to beg the question to be decided. For the terms "present" and "continuous" are used merely to symbolize those activities of the corporation's agent within the state which courts will deem to be sufficient to satisfy the demands of due process. Those demands must be met by such contacts of the corporation with the state of the forum as make it reasonable, in the context of our federal system of government, to require the corporation to defend itself in a particular suit which is brought there. An "estimate of the inconveniences" which would result to the corporation from a trial away from its "home" or principal place of business is irrelevant to this connection.

"Presence" in the state in this sense has never been doubted when the activities of the corporation there have not only been continuous and systematic, but also given rise to liabilities sued on, even though no consent to be sued or authorization to an agent to receive service of process has been given. Conversely it has been generally recognized that the mere presence of the corporate agent or even his conduct of single or isolated items of business in a state in the corporation's behalf are not enough to subject it to suit on causes unconnected with the activities there. To require the corporation in such circumstances to defend the suit away from its home or other jurisdiction where it carries on most of its activities has been thought to lay too great and unreasonable a burden on the corporation to comport with due process.

While it has been held, in cases on which appellant relies, that continuous activities within a state is not enough to support the demand that the corporation be made to defend suits unrelated to that activity, there have been instances in which the continuous operations within a state were thought so substantial and of such a nature as to render it liable to be sued in a state on causes of action arising from dealings entirely distinct from those activities.

Finally, although the commission of some single or occasional acts of the corporate agent in a state sufficient to impose an obligation or liability on the corporation has not been thought to confer upon the state authority to enforce it, other such acts, because of their nature and quality and the circumstances of their commission, may be deemed sufficient to render the corporation liable to suit. True, some of the decisions holding the corporation amenable to suit have been supported by resort to the legal fiction that it has given its consent to service and suit, consent being implied from its presence in the state through the acts of its authorized agents. But more realistically it may be said that those authorized acts were of such a nature as to justify the fiction.

It is evident that the criteria by which we mark the boundary line between those activities which justify the subjection of a corporation to suit, and those which do not, cannot be simply mechanical or quantitative. The test is not merely, as has sometimes been suggested, whether the activity, which the corporation has seen fit to procure through its agents in another state, is a little more or a little less. Whether due process is satisfied must depend rather upon the quality and nature of the activity in relation to the fair and orderly administration of the laws which it was the purpose of the due process clause to insure. That clause does not contemplate that a state may make binding a judgment in personam against an individual or corporate defendant with which the state has no contacts, ties, or relations. Cf. Pennoyer v. Neff.

But to the extent that a corporation exercises the privilege of conducting activities within a state, it enjoys the benefits and protection of the laws of that state. The exercise of that privilege may give rise to obligations, and, so far as those obligations arise out of or are connected with the activities within the state, a procedure which requires the corporation to respond to a suit brought to enforce them can, in most instances, hardly be said to be undue.

Applying these standards, the activities carried on in behalf of appellant in the State of Washington were neither irregular nor casual. They were systematic and continuous throughout the years in question. They resulted in a large volume of interstate business, in the course of which appellant received the benefits and protection of the laws of the state, including the right to resort to the courts for the enforcement of its rights. The obligation which is here sued upon arose out of those very activities. It is evident that these operations establish sufficient contacts or ties with the state of the forum to make it reasonable and just, according to our traditional conception of fair play and substantial justice, to permit the state to enforce the obligations which appellant has incurred there. Hence we cannot say that the maintenance of the present suit in the State of Washington involves an unreasonable or undue procedure.

We are likewise unable to conclude that the service of the process within the state upon an agent whose activities establish appellant's "presence" there was not sufficient notice of the suit, or that the suit was so unrelated to those activities as to make the agent an inappropriate vehicle for communicating the notice. It is enough that appellant has established such contacts with the state that the particular form of substituted service adopted there gives reasonable assurance that the notice will be actual. Nor can we say that the mailing of the notice of suit to appellant by registered mail at its home office was not reasonably calculated to apprise appellant of the suit.

Appellant having rendered itself amenable to suit upon obligations arising out of its salesmen in Washington, the state may maintain the present suit in personam the tax laid upon the exercise of the privilege of employing appellant's salesmen within the state. For Washington has made one of those activities, which taken together establish "presence" there for purposes of suit, the taxable event by which the state brings the appellant within the reach of its taxing power. The state thus has constitutional power to lay a tax upon the appellant's salesmen within the state, and it has the right to subject appellant to a suit to recover it. The activities which establish its "presence" are alike to taxation by the state and to suit to recover the tax.

Note on International Shoe

International Shoe extended the reach of personal jurisdiction over out-of-state parties. As a result, personal jurisdiction no longer requires personal service on the defendant while they are present in the state.

Service of the complaint and summons is still required to satisfy the notice aspect of due process. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, adopted in the same year that the Court decided International Shoe, removed that requirement, permitting service by various alternate means and giving defendants an incentive to respond if they receive actual notice. Fed.R.Civ.P. Rule 4.

The requirements of personal jurisdiction and service of process are analogous to an electrical circuit. Minimum contacts between the defendant and the forum state are the wiring. Service of process is the switch. The forum state cannot exercise power over the defendant unless the wiring is connected (personal jurisdiction) and the switch is turned on (service of process).

Suppose that Dan, who lives in Ohio, rents a beach house in the Outer Banks from Pat, who lives in North Carolina. One evening, while enjoying several cocktails on the deck, Dan carelessly knocks over a Tiki torch, starting a fire that destroys the house. After Dan returns home to Ohio, Pat files suit in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina.

The suit arises out of Dan's conduct in North Carolina, satisfying the minimum contacts requirement for personal jurisdiction. But there has been no service of process, so the court's power is not yet activated (Fig. 4.1).

After filing the suit, Pat serves Dan with a copy of the summons and complaint, in a manner authorized, and within the time allowed, under Rule 4. The court's power is now active (Fig. 4.2).

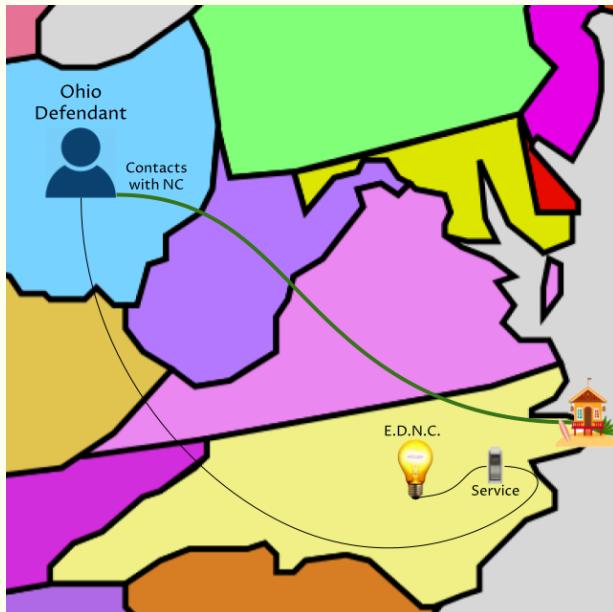

Fig. 4.2

Suppose instead that Pat travels from North Carolina to Ohio for a football game between the Carolina Panthers and the Cleveland Browns. Dan, a diehard Browns fan, was sitting behind Pat. Throughout the game, Pat vociferously cheers for the visiting team and mercilessly heckles the Cleveland quarterback. Annoyed with Pat's taunts, Dan pours a large cup of beer over Pat's head, provoking a brawl in which Pat is badly injured. After returning home, having vowed never to return to Ohio again, Pat sues Dan for battery, filing the case in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina.

In this case, there has been service of process, but the suit does not arise out of any contacts between Ohio and North Carolina. So the switch is not connected and the court has no power at all (Fig. 4.3).

1.2 Specific Jurisdiction

McGee v. International Life Ins. Co., 355 US 220

Opinion of the Court by Justice BLACK, announced by DOUGLAS.

Petitioner, Lulu B. McGee, recovered a judgment in a California state court against International Life Insurance Company, on a contract of insurance. Respondent was served with process in California but by registered mail at its principal place of business in New York. The California court based its jurisdiction on a state statute which subjects foreign corporations to suit in California on insurance contracts with residents of that State even though the corporations cannot be served with process within its borders.

Unable to collect the judgment in California petitioner went to Texas where she filed suit on the judgment in a Texas court. But the Texas courts refused to enforce her judgment holding it was void under the Fourteenth Amendment because service of process outside California could not give the courts of that State jurisdiction over respondent. Since the case raised important questions, not only to California but to other States which have similar laws, we granted certiorari. It is not controverted that if the California court properly exercised jurisdiction over respondent the Texas courts erred in refusing to give its judgment full faith and credit.

The material facts are relatively simple. In 1944, Lowell Franklin, a resident of California, purchased a life insurance policy from the Empire Mutual Insurance Company, an Arizona corporation. In 1948 the respondent agreed with Empire Mutual to assume its insurance obligations. Respondent then mailed a reinsurance certificate to Franklin in California offering to insure him in accordance with the terms of the policy he held with Empire Mutual. He accepted this offer and from that time until his death in 1950 paid premiums by mail from his California home to respondent's Texas office. Petitioner, Franklin's mother, was the beneficiary under the policy. She sent proofs of his death to the respondent but it refused to pay claiming that he had committed suicide. It appears that neither Empire Mutual nor respondent has ever had any office or agent in California. And so far as the record before us shows, respondent has never solicited or done any insurance business in California apart from the policy involved here.

Since Pennoyer v. Neff, this Court has held that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment places some limit on the power of state courts to enter binding judgments against persons not served with process within their boundaries. But just where this line of limitation falls has been the subject of prolific controversy, particularly with respect to foreign corporations. In a continuing process of evolution this Court accepted and then abandoned "consent," "doing business," and "presence" as the standard for measuring the extent of state judicial power over such corporations. More recently in International Shoe Co. v. Washington, the Court decided that "due process requires only that in order to subject a defendant to a judgment in personam, if he be not present within the territory of the forum, he have certain minimum contacts with it such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend 'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.'"

Looking back over this long history of litigation a trend is clearly discernible toward expanding the permissible scope of state jurisdiction over foreign corporations and other nonresidents. In part this is attributable to the fundamental transformation of our national economy over the years. Today many commercial transactions touch two or more States and may involve parties separated by the full continent. With this increasing nationalization of commerce has come a great increase in the amount of business conducted by mail across state lines. At the same time modern transportation and communication have made it much less burdensome for a party sued to defend himself in a State where he engages in economic activity.

Turning to this case we think it apparent that the Due Process Clause did not preclude the California court from entering a judgment binding on respondent. It is sufficient for purposes of due process that the suit was based on a contract which had substantial connection with that State. The contract was delivered in California, the premiums were mailed from there and the insured was a resident of that State when he died. It cannot be denied that California has a manifest interest in providing effective means of redress for its residents when their insurers refuse to pay claims. These residents would be at a severe disadvantage if they were required to follow the insurance company to a distant State in order to hold it legally accountable. If the claims were small or moderate individual claimants frequently could not afford the expense of bringing an action in a foreign forum—thus in effect making the company judgment proof. Often the crucial witnesses—as here on the company's defense of suicide—will be located outside the insured's locality. Of course there may be inconvenience to the insurer if it is held to defend a suit in California where it had this contract but certainly nothing which amounts to a denial of due process. There is no contention that respondent did not have adequate notice and a reasonable sufficient time to prepare its defenses and appear.

The California statute became law in 1949, after respondent had entered into the agreement with Franklin to assume Empire Mutual's obligation to him. Respondent contends that the application of the statute to this existing contract improperly impairs the obligation of the insurer. We believe that contention is devoid of merit. The statute was remedial, in the purest sense, and neither enlarged nor impaired respondent's substantive rights or obligations under the contract. It did nothing more than to provide petitioner with a California forum in which to assert whatever substantive rights she might have against respondent. At the same time, respondent was given a reasonable time to appear and defend on the merits after being notified of the suit. Under such circumstances it had no vested right not to be sued in California.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded to the Court of Civil Appeals of the State of Texas, First Supreme Judicial District, for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286 (1980)

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The issue before us is whether, consistently with the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, an Oklahoma court may exercise in personam jurisdiction over a nonresident automobile retailer and its wholesale distributor in a products-liability action. The defendants' only connection with Oklahoma is the fact that an automobile sold in New York residents became involved in an accident in Oklahoma.

I

Respondents Harry and Kay Robinson purchased a new Audi automobile from petitioner World-Wide Volkswagen, Inc. (Seaway), in Massena, N. Y., in 1976. The following year the Robinsons, who resided in New York, left that State for a new home in Arizona. As they passed through the State of Oklahoma, another car struck their Audi in the rear, causing a fire which severely injured Kay Robinson and her two children.

The Robinsons subsequently brought a products-liability action in the District Court for Creek County, Okla., claiming that their injuries resulted from defective design and placement of the Audi's gas tank and fuel system. They joined as defendants the automobile's manufacturer, Audi NSU Auto Union Aktiengesellschaft (Audi); its importer, Volkswagen of America, Inc. (Volkswagen); its regional distributor, petitioner World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. (World-Wide); and its retail dealer, petitioner Seaway. Seaway and World-Wide entered special appearances, claiming that Oklahoma's exercise of jurisdiction over them would offend the limitations on the State's jurisdiction imposed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The facts presented to the District Court showed that World-Wide is incorporated and has its business office in New York. It distributes vehicles, parts, and accessories, under contract with Volkswagen, to retail dealers in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. Seaway, one of these retail dealers, is incorporated and has its place of business in New York. Insofar as the record reveals, Seaway and World-Wide are fully independent corporations whose relations with each other and with Volkswagen and Audi are contractual only. Respondents adduced no evidence that either World-Wide or Seaway does any business in Oklahoma, ships or sells any products to or in that State, has an agent to receive process there, or purchases advertisements in any media calculated to reach Oklahoma. In fact, as respondents' counsel conceded at oral argument, there was no showing that any automobile sold by World-Wide or Seaway has ever entered Oklahoma with the single exception of the vehicle involved in the present case.

II

The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment limits the power of a state court to render a valid personal judgment against a nonresident defendant. A judgment rendered in violation of due process is void in the rendering State and is not entitled to full faith and credit elsewhere. Due process requires that the defendant be given adequate notice of the suit, and be subject to the personal jurisdiction of the court. In the present case, the only question is whether these particular petitioners were subject to the jurisdiction of the Oklahoma courts.

As has long been settled, and as we reaffirm today, a state court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant only so long as there exist "minimum contacts" between the defendant and the forum State. International Shoe Co. v. Washington. The concept of minimum contacts, in turn, can be seen to perform two related, but distinguishable, functions. It protects the defendant against the burdens of litigating in a distant or inconvenient forum. And it acts to ensure that the States, through their courts, do not reach out beyond the limits imposed on them by their status as coequal sovereigns in a federal system.

The protection against inconvenient litigation is typically described in terms of "reasonableness" or "fairness." We have said that the defendant's contacts with the forum State must be such that maintenance of the suit "does not offend 'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.'" International Shoe Co. The relationship between the defendant and the forum must be such that it is "reasonable to require the corporation to defend the particular suit which is brought there." Implicit in this emphasis on reasonableness is the understanding that the burden on the defendant, while always a primary concern, will in an appropriate case be considered in light of other relevant factors, including the forum State's interest in the dispute, the plaintiff's interest in obtaining convenient and effective relief, at least where the plaintiff's interest is not adequately protected by the plaintiff's power to choose the forum, the judicial system's interest in obtaining the most efficient resolution of controversies, and the shared interest of the several States in furthering fundamental substantive social policies.

The limits imposed on state jurisdiction by the Due Process Clause, in its role as a protection against inconvenient litigation, have been substantially relaxed over the years. In McGee v. International Life Ins. Co., this trend is largely attributable to a transformation in the American economy:

Today many commercial transactions touch two or more States and may involve parties from one end of the country to the other, and even across the entire continent. With this increasing nationalization of commerce has come a great increase in the amount of business conducted by mail across state lines. At the same time, modern methods of transportation and communication have made it much less burdensome for a party sued to appear in person in a State where he engages in economic activity.

The historical developments noted in McGee, of course, have only accelerated in the last half century since that case was decided.

Nevertheless, we have never accepted the proposition that state lines are irrelevant for jurisdictional purposes, nor could we, and remain faithful to the principles of federalism embodied in the Constitution. The economic interdependence of the States was foreseen and desired by the Framers. In the Commerce Clause, they provided that the United States was to be a common market, a "free trade unit" in which the States are debarred from being separate economic entities. But the Framers also intended that the States retain many of the attributes of sovereignty, including, in particular, the sovereign power to try cases in their own courts. The sovereignty of each State, in turn, implied a limitation on the sovereignty of its sister States—a limitation express or implicit in both the original scheme of the Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment.

Hence, even while abandoning the shibboleth that "the authority of every tribunal is limited to the territory within which it is established and cannot be extended beyond those limits," Pennoyer v. Neff, 90 U.S. 714, 730 (1875), the Court emphasized that the reasonableness of asserting jurisdiction over the defendant must be assessed "in the context of our federal system of government," International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 367 U.S. 420, 437 (1961), and stressed that the Due Process Clause ensures not only fairness but also "orderly administration of the laws," id. As we noted in Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S. 222, 236 (1958):

As technological progress has increased the flow of commerce between the States, the exercise of personal jurisdiction over nonresidents has undergone a similar increase. At the same time, improved communications and transportation has made the defense of a suit in a foreign trial less burdensome. In response to these changes, the requirements for personal jurisdiction over nonresidents have evolved from the rigid rule of Pennoyer v. Neff to the flexible standard set forth in International Shoe Co. v. Washington. But it is a mistake to assume that this trend heralds the eventual demise of all restrictions on the personal jurisdiction of state courts. Those restrictions are more than a guarantee of immunity from inconvenient or distant litigation. They are the consequence of territorial limitations on the power of the respective States.

Thus, the Due Process Clause “does not contemplate that a state may make binding a judgment in personam against an individual or corporate defendant with which the state has no contacts, ties, or relations.” International Shoe Co. Even if the defendant would suffer minimal or no inconvenience from being forced to litigate before the tribunals of another State; even if the forum State has a strong interest in applying its law to the controversy; even if the forum State is the most convenient location for litigation, the Due Process Clause, acting as an instrument of interstate federalism, may sometimes act to divest the State of its power to render a valid judgment.

Applying these principles to the case at hand, we find in the record before us a total absence of those affiliating circumstances that are a necessary predicate to any exercise of state-court jurisdiction. Petitioners carry on no activity whatsoever in Oklahoma. They close no sales and perform no services there. They avail themselves of none of the privileges and benefits of Oklahoma law. They solicit no business there either through salespersons or through advertising reasonably calculated to reach the State. Nor does the record show that they regularly sell cars at wholesale or retail to Oklahoma customers or residents or that they indirectly, through others, serve or seek to serve the Oklahoma market. In short, respondents seek to base jurisdiction on one, isolated occurrence and whatever inferences can be drawn therefrom: the fortuitous circumstance that a single Audi automobile, sold in New York to New York residents, happened to suffer an accident while passing through Oklahoma.

It is argued, however, that because an automobile is mobile by its very design and purpose it was “foreseeable” that the Robinsons’ Audi would cause injury in Oklahoma. Yet “foreseeability” alone has never been a sufficient benchmark for personal jurisdiction under the Due Process Clause.

This is not to say, of course, that foreseeability is wholly irrelevant. But the foreseeability that is critical to due process analysis is not the mere likelihood that a product will find its way into the forum State. Rather, it is that the defendant’s conduct and connection with the forum State are such that he should reasonably anticipate being haled into court there. The Due Process Clause, by ensuring the “orderly administration of the laws,” International Shoe Co., gives a degree of predictability to the legal system that allows potential defendants to structure their primary conduct with some minimum assurance as to where that conduct will and will not render them liable to suit.

When a corporation “purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State,” Hanson v. Denckla, it has clear notice that it is subject to suit there, and can act to alleviate the risk of burdensome litigation by procuring insurance, passing the expected costs on to customers, or, if the risks are too great, severing its connection with the State. Hence if the sale of a product of a manufacturer or distributor such as Audi or Volkswagen is not simply an isolated occurrence, but arises from the efforts of the manufacturer or distributor to serve, directly or indirectly, the market for its product in other States, it is not unreasonable to subject it to suit in one of those States if its allegedly defective merchandise has there been the source of injury to its owner or to others. The forum State does not exceed its powers under the Due Process Clause if it asserts personal jurisdiction over a corporation that delivers its products into the stream of commerce with the expectation that they will be purchased by consumers in the forum State.

But there is no such or similar basis for Oklahoma jurisdiction over World-Wide in this case. Seaway's sales are made in Massena, N. Y. World-Wide's market, although larger, is limited to dealers in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. There is no record that any automobiles distributed by World-Wide are sold to retail customers in this tristate area. It is foreseeable that the purchasers of automobiles sold by World-Wide may take them to Oklahoma. But the mere "unilateral activity of those who have no substantial minimum contacts with the forum State" does not establish a relationship with a nonresident defendant cannot satisfy the requirement of constitutional jurisdiction in the forum State." Hanson v. Denckla.

In a variant on the previous argument, it is contended that jurisdiction can be established by the fact that petitioners earn substantial revenue from goods used in Oklahoma. Even if this inference seems less than compelling on the facts of the instant case, we need not rely on the court's factual findings in order to reject its reasoning.

This argument seems to make the point that the purchase of automobiles in New York, in which the petitioners earn substantial revenue, would not occur but for the fact that the automobiles are capable of use in distant States like Oklahoma. Respondents observe that the very purpose of an automobile is to travel, and that travel of automobiles sold by Volkswagen is facilitated by an extensive chain of Volkswagen service centers throughout the United States, including some in Oklahoma. However, financial benefits accruing to the defendant in the collateral relation to the forum State will not support jurisdiction if they do not establish constitutionally cognizable contact with that State. In our view, whatever marginal financial benefits petitioners may receive by virtue of the fact that their products are capable of use in Oklahoma are far too attenuated a contact to justify that State's exercise of in personam jurisdiction.

Justice BRENNAN, dissenting.

The Court holds that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment bars the states from asserting jurisdiction over the defendants in these two cases. In each case the Court holds that the state has failed to find the "minimum contacts" that have been required since International Shoe Co. v. Washington. Because I believe that the Court reads International Shoe and its progeny too narrowly, and because I believe that the standards enunciated by those cases may be obsolete as constitutional boundaries, I dissent.

I

The Court's opinions focus tightly on the existence of contacts between the forum state and the defendant. In so doing, they accord too little weight to the strength of the forum State's interest in adjudicating the case and fail to explore whether there would be any actual inconvenience to the defendant. The essential inquiry in locating the constitutional limits on state-court jurisdiction is whether the defendant has sufficient contacts with the forum state to make it reasonable to subject him to suit there.

defendants is whether the particular exercise of jurisdiction offends “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.” International Shoe. The clear focus in International Shoe was on fairness and reasonableness. The Court specifically declined to establish a mechanical test based on the quantum of contacts between a State and the defendant:

Whether due process is satisfied must depend rather upon the quality and nature of the activity in relation to the fair and orderly administration of the laws which it was the purpose of the due process clause to insure. That clause does not contemplate that a state may make binding a judgment in personam against an individual or corporate defendant with which the state has no contacts, ties, or relations.

The existence of contacts, so long as there were some, was merely one way of giving content to the determination of fairness and reasonableness.

Surely International Shoe contemplated that the significance of the contacts necessary to support jurisdiction would diminish if some other consideration helped establish that jurisdiction would be fair and reasonable. The interests of the State and other parties in proceeding with the case in a particular forum are such considerations. McGee v. International Life Ins. Co., 355 U. S. 220, 223 (1957), for instance, accorded great importance to a State’s “manifest interest in providing effective means of redress” for its citizens.

Another consideration is the actual burden a defendant must bear in defending the suit in the forum. Because lesser burdens reduce the unfairness to the defendant, jurisdiction may be justified despite less significant contacts. The burden, of course, must be of constitutional dimension. Due process limits on jurisdiction do not protect a defendant from all inconvenience of travel, and it would not be sensible to make the constitutional rule turn solely on the number of miles the defendant must travel to the courtroom. Instead, the constitutionally significant “burden” to be analyzed relates to the mobility of the defendant’s defense. For instance, if having to travel to a foreign forum would hamper the defense because witnesses or evidence or the defendant himself were immobile, or if there were a disproportionately large number of witnesses or amount of evidence that would have to be transported at the defendant’s expense, or if being away from home for the duration of the trial would work some special hardship on the defendant, then the Constitution would require special consideration for the defendant’s interests.

That considerations other than contacts between the forum and the defendant are relevant necessarily means that the Constitution does not require that trial be held in the State which has the “best contacts” with the defendant. The defendant has no constitutional entitlement to the best forum or, for that matter, to any particular forum. We need only determine whether the forum States in these cases satisfy the constitutional minimum.

II

I would find that the forum State has an interest in permitting the litigation to go forward, the litigation is connected to the forum, the defendant is linked to the forum, and the burden of defending is not unreasonable. Accordingly, I would hold that it is neither unfair nor unreasonable to require these defendants to defend in the forum State.

The interest of the forum State and its connection to the litigation is strong. The accident underlying the litigation occurred in Oklahoma. The plaintiffs were hospitalized in Oklahoma when they brought suit. Essential witnesses and evidence were in Oklahoma. The State has a legitimate interest in enforcing its laws designed to keep its highway system safe. The trial can proceed at least as efficiently in Oklahoma as anywhere else.

The petitioners are not unconnected with the forum. Although both sell automobiles in limited sales territories, each sold the automobile which in fact was driven to Oklahoma by someone who was involved in an accident. It may be true, as the Court suggests, that each sincerely intended that the automobile would not move outside the limited territory, and that each intended to accept the jurisdiction of the forum State only for the enforcement of the laws of those States within the territory. But obviously such unrealistic hopes that cannot be treated as an automatic constitutional shield.

An automobile simply is not a stationary item or one designed to be used in one place. An automobile is intended to be moved around. Someone in the business of selling large numbers of automobiles can hardly plead ignorance of their mobility or pretend that the vehicles will stay put after they are sold. It is not merely that a dealer in automobiles foresees that his customers will move. The dealer actually intends that the purchasers will use the automobile in distant States where the dealer does not directly "do business." The sale of an automobile purposefully injects the vehicle into the stream of interstate commerce so that it will be used in distant States.

Furthermore, an automobile seller derives substantial benefits from States other than the one in which he resides. A large part of the value of automobiles is the extensive, nationwide network of dealerships that serve all the individual States, including Oklahoma. The States, through their highway programs, contribute in a very direct and important way to the value of petitioners' businesses. Additionally, the dealer's service department, which has a network of other related dealerships with their service departments operates throughout the country under the protection of the laws of the various States, including Oklahoma, and adds substantially to the value of petitioners' businesses by facilitating their customers' traveling.

Thus, the Court errs in its conclusion that "petitioners have no contacts, ties, or relationships with the forum State." There are contacts, and, given Oklahoma's connection to the accident, the contacts are sufficiently significant to make it fair and reasonable for the petitioners to submit to Oklahoma's jurisdiction.

III

International Shoe inherited its defendant focus from Pennoyer v. Neff, and represented a major step this Court has taken in the long process of liberalizing the doctrine of state jurisdiction. Though its flexible approach represented a major advance, the structure of society has changed in many significant ways since International Shoe was decided. Mr. Justice Black, writing for the Court in McGee v. International Life Ins. Co., recognized "a trend is clearly discernible toward expanding the permissible scope of state jurisdiction over foreign corporations and other nonresidents." He explained the trend as follows:

In part this is attributable to the fundamental transformation of our national economy over the years. Today many commercial transactions touch two or more States and may involve parties separated by the full continent. With this increasing nationalization of commerce has come a great increase in the amount of business conducted by mail across state lines. At the same time modern transportation and communication have made it much less burdensome for a party sued to defend himself in a State where he engages in economic activity.

Both the nationalization of commerce and the ease of transportation and communication have accelerated in the generation since 1957. The model of society on which the International Shoe Court based its opinion is no longer accurate. Business people, no matter how local their businesses, cannot assume that goods remain in the business' locality. Customers and goods can be anywhere else in the country usually in a matter of hours and always in a matter of a very few days.

In answering the question whether or not it is fair and reasonable to allow a particular forum to hold a trial binding on a particular defendant, the interests of the forum State and other parties loom large in today's world and surely are entitled to as much weight as are the interests of the defendant. The "orderly administration of the laws" provides a firm basis for according some protection to the interests of plaintiffs and States as well as of defendants. Certainly, I cannot see how a defendant's right to due process is violated if the defendant suffers no inconvenience.

The conclusion I draw is that constitutional concepts of fairness no longer require the extreme concern for defendants that was once necessary. Rather, minimum contacts must exist "among the parties, the contested transaction, and the forum State." The contacts between any two of these should not be determinate.

Justice BLACKMUN, dissenting.

I confess that I am somewhat puzzled why the plaintiffs in this litigation are so insistent that the regional distributor and the retail dealer, the petitioners here, who handled the ill-fated Audi automobile involved in this litigation, be named defendants. It would appear that the manufacturer and the importer, whose subjectability to Oklahoma jurisdiction is not challenged before this Court, ought not to be judgment-proof. It may, of course, ultimately amount to a contest between insurance companies that, once begun, is not easily brought to a termination. Having made this much of an observation, I pursue it no further.

Keeton v. Hustler Magazine, Inc., 465 US 770 (1984)

Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

Petitioner Kathy Keeton sued respondent Hustler Magazine, Inc., and other defendants in the United States District Court for the District of New Hampshire, alleging jurisdiction over her libel complaint by reason of diversity of citizenship. The District Court dismissed her suit because it believed that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution forbade the application of New Hampshire's long-arm statute to acquire personal jurisdiction over respondent. The Court of Appeals for the affirmed, summarizing its concerns with the statement that "the New Hampshire ta to wag so large an out-of-state dog." We granted certiorari, and we now reverse.

Petitioner Keeton is a resident of New York. Her only connection with New Hampshire is her circulation there of copies of a magazine that she assists in producing. The magazine contains petitioner's name in several places crediting her with editorial and other work. Hustler Magazine, Inc., is an Ohio corporation, with its principal place of business in New York. Respondent's contacts with New Hampshire consist of the sale of some 10,000 to 15,000 copies of Hustler Magazine in that State each month. Petitioner claims to have been 150 to 200 separate issues of respondent's magazine published between September 1975 and May 1976.

6. (n.1 in opinion) Initially, petitioner brought suit for libel and invasion of privacy in Ohio, where the magazine was published. Her libel claim, however, was dismissed as barred by the Ohio statute of limitations, and her invasion-of-privacy claim was dismissed as barred by the New York statute of limitations, which the Ohio court considered to be 'migratory.' Petitioner then filed the present action in October 1980.

The Court of Appeals, in its opinion affirming the District Court's dismissal of the complaint, held that petitioner's lack of contacts with New Hampshire rendered any interest in redressing the tort of libel to petitioner too attenuated for an assertion of personal jurisdiction over respondent. The Court of Appeals observed that the "single publication rule" ordinarily applicable in multistate libel cases would require it to award petitioner damages for all injuries caused in all states if she prevailed in her suit, even though the bulk of petitioner's injuries had been sustained outside New Hampshire. The court also stressed New Hampshire's unusual choice of law and unusually long (6-year) limitations period for libel actions. New Hampshire was the only state where petitioner's suit would not have been time-barred when it was filed. Under these circumstances, the Court of Appeals concluded that it would be "unfair" to assert jurisdiction over respondent. New Hampshire has a minimal interest in applying its unusual limitations to, and awarding damages for, injuries to a nonresident occurring outside the State, particularly since petitioner suffered such a small proportion of her total claimed damages in the State.

We conclude that the Court of Appeals erred when it affirmed the dismissal of petitioner's libel action for lack of personal jurisdiction. Respondent's regular circulation of magazines in New Hampshire and the State is sufficient to support an assertion of jurisdiction in a libel action based on the publication of the magazine. This is so even if New Hampshire courts would apply the so-called "single publication rule" to enable petitioner to recover in the New Hampshire action her damages for the "publications" of the alleged libel throughout the United States.

The District Court found that "the general course of conduct in circulating the magazine throughout the state was purposefully directed at New Hampshire, and inevitably affected persons in the state." Such regular monthly sales of thousands of magazines cannot reasonably be stretch of the imagination be characterized as random, isolated, or fortuitous. It is equally unquestionable that New Hampshire jurisdiction over a complaint based on the publication of the magazine would ordinarily satisfy the requirement of the Due Process Clause that a State's exercise of personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant be predicated on "minimum contacts" between the defendant and the State. And, as the Court of Appeals acknowledged, New Hampshire has adopted a "long-arm" statute authorizing service of process on corporations whenever permitted by the Due Process Clause. Thus, all the requirements for personal jurisdiction over Hustler Magazine, Inc., in New Hampshire are present.

We think that the three concerns advanced by the Court of Appeals, whether considered singly or together, are not sufficiently weighty to merit a different result. The “single publication rule,” New Hampshire’s unusually long statute of limitations, and plaintiff’s lack of contacts with the forum State do not defeat jurisdiction otherwise proper under both New Hampshire law and the Due Process Clause.

In judging minimum contacts, a court properly focuses on “the relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation.” Thus, it is certainly relevant to the jurisdictional inquiry that petitioner is seeking to recover damages suffered in all States in this one suit. The contacts between respondent and the forum must be judged in the light of that claim, rather than a claim only for damages sustained in New Hampshire. That is, the contacts between respondent and New Hampshire must be such that it is “fair” to compel respondent to defend a multistate lawsuit in New Hampshire seeking nationwide damages for all copies of the five issues in question, even though only a small portion of those copies were distributed in New Hampshire.

The Court of Appeals expressed the view that New Hampshire’s “interest” in asserting jurisdiction over plaintiff’s multistate claim was minimal. We agree that the “fairness” of haling respondent into a New Hampshire court depends to some extent on whether respondent’s activities relating to New Hampshire are such as to give that State a legitimate interest in holding respondent answerable on a claim related to those activities. But insofar as the State’s “interest” in adjudicating the dispute is a part of the Fourteenth Amendment due process equation, as a surrogate for some of the factors already mentioned, we think the interest is sufficient.

The Court of Appeals acknowledged that petitioner was suing, at least in part, for damages suffered in New Hampshire. And it is beyond dispute that New Hampshire has a significant interest in redressing injuries that actually occur within the State.

This interest extends to libel actions brought by nonresidents. False statements of fact harm both the subject of the falsehood and the readers of the statement. New Hampshire may rightly employ its libel laws to discourage the deception of its citizens.

New Hampshire may also extend its concern to the injury that in-state libel causes within New Hampshire to a nonresident. The tort of libel is generally held to occur wherever the offending material is circulated. The reputation of the libel victim may suffer harm even in a State in which he has hitherto been anonymous. The communication of the libel may create a negative reputation among the residents of a jurisdiction where the plaintiff’s previous reputation was, however small, at least unblemished.

New Hampshire has clearly expressed its interest in protecting such persons from libel, as well as in safeguarding its populace from falsehoods. Its criminal defamation statute bears no restriction to libels of which residents are the victim. Moreover, in 1971 New Hampshire specifically deleted from its long-arm statute the requirement that a tort be committed “against a resident of New Hampshire.”

New Hampshire also has a substantial interest in cooperating with other States “single publication rule,” to provide a forum for efficiently litigating all issues claims arising out of a libel in a unitary proceeding. This rule reduces the potential drain of libel cases on judicial resources. It also serves to protect defendants from resulting from multiple suits. In sum, the combination of New Hampshire’s redressing injuries that occur within the State and its interest in cooperating with in the application of the “single publication rule” demonstrates the propriety respondent to answer to a multistate libel action in New Hampshire.

The Court of Appeals also thought that there was an element of due process “unfair” from the fact that the statutes of limitations in every jurisdiction except New Hampshire run on the plaintiff’s claim in this case. Strictly speaking, however, any potential problem in applying New Hampshire’s statute of limitations to all aspects of this nation-wide libel presents nothing to do with the jurisdiction of the court to adjudicate the claims. The question of the applicability of New Hampshire’s statute of limitations to claims for out-of-state libel presents itself in the course of litigation only after jurisdiction over respondent is established and we do not think that such choice-of-law concerns should complicate our jurisdictional inquiry.

The chance duration of statutes of limitations in nonforum jurisdictions has nothing to do with the contacts among respondent, New Hampshire, and this multistate libel action. Ohio’s limitations period is six months or six years does not alter the jurisdiction of New Hampshire. Petitioner’s successful search for a State with a lengthy statute of limitations is no different from the litigation strategy of countless plaintiffs who seek a forum with substantive or procedural rules or sympathetic local populations. Certainly Hustler magazine Inc., which chose to enter the New Hampshire market, can be charged with knowledge of and no doubt would have claimed the benefit of them if it had a complaint against its distributor, or other commercial partner.

Finally, implicit in the Court of Appeals’ analysis of New Hampshire’s interest is the lack of contacts between the plaintiff and New Hampshire. But we have required a plaintiff to have “minimum contacts” with the forum State before permitting the forum State to assert personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant. On the contrary, the Supreme Court upheld the assertion of jurisdiction where such contacts were entirely lacking. Requiring a defendant to have “minimum contacts” with the forum State by carrying on a “part of its general business” in New Hampshire, and that is sufficient for jurisdiction when the cause of action arises out of the very activity being conducted in New Hampshire.

The plaintiff’s residence is not, of course, completely irrelevant to the jurisdiction of the forum State. As the Court of Appeals has noted, inquiry focuses on the relations among the defendant, the forum, and the plaintiff. Plaintiff’s residence may well play an important role in determining the propriety of the forum’s jurisdiction in entertaining a suit against the defendant in the forum. That is, plaintiff’s residence may, because of defendant’s relationship with the plaintiff, enhance defendant’s contacts with the forum. Plaintiff’s residence may be the focus of the activities of the defendant during the time the suit arises. But plaintiff’s residence in the forum State is not a separate requirement of jurisdiction. Defendant’s contacts with the forum will not defeat jurisdiction established on the basis of defendant’s contacts with the plaintiff.

It is undoubtedly true that the bulk of the harm done to petitioner occurred outside New Hampshire. But that will be true in almost every libel action brought somewhere other than the plaintiff's domicile. There is no justification for restricting libel actions to the plaintiff's home forum. The victim of a libel, like the victim of any other tort, may choose to bring suit in any forum with which the defendant has "certain minimum contacts such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend 'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice."

Where, as in this case, respondent Hustler Magazine, Inc., has continuously and deliberately exploited the New Hampshire market, it must reasonably anticipate being haled into court there in a libel action based on the contents of its magazine. And, since respondent can be charged with knowledge of the "single publication rule," it must anticipate that such a suit will seek nationwide damages. Respondent produces a national publication aimed at a nationwide audience. There is no unfairness in calling it to answer for the contents of that publication wherever a substantial number of copies are regularly sold and distributed.

Note on Keeton

This news story provides some background about Keeton's suit.

Keeton's Reputation An Issue In Defamation Suit

Michael Morkzycki, Aug. 6, 1986

CONCORD N.H. (AP) — Lawyers for a Penthouse magazine executive today closed their defamation suit against Hustler magazine and publisher Larry Flynt by reading a deposition in which Flynt scoffed at libel laws.

"I didn't care then and I don't care now," he said in the 1984 deposition taken in another case.

Flynt is being sued by Kathy Keeton for $1.6 million, who alleges that her reputation was libeled by material printed in Hustler.

The lawyer questioning Flynt in 1984 asked him if he realized he could injure people or cause people mental anguish worse than physical pain by what he published in Hustler.

"You (are) right and you're all going to be on your knees before we finish here," Flynt replied.

After reading the deposition into the record, Keeton's lawyers rested their case.

Judge Edward Northup told the jurors to keep in mind the deposition was taken two years ago in a different case.

In earlier testimony, Hustler magazine's lawyers tried to paint Keeton as someone whose reputation cannot be libeled.

During the second day of trial in her lawsuit, Keeton's chief lawyer tried instead to present her as an immigrant from South Africa who worked her way to the top of the American publishing industry.

Norman Roy Grutman, one of Keeton's four lawyers at the U.S. District Court trial, closed his questioning of her Tuesday by noting that she was among prominent immigrants invited to tape 30-second television spots this year for the Statue of Liberty centennial.

Grutman also portrayed Penthouse and its publisher, Robert Guccione - Keeton's common-law husband - as winners of numerous awards and honors. He read a lengthy list of notables who have written for the magazine or been interviewed in it.

But earlier, Hustler lawyers showed the four-woman, two-man jury blowups of color photographs of a bare-breasted Keeton performing a striptease at a London nightclub. The photos were published in Penthouse in 1966, when the magazine was distributed only in the United Kingdom.

Keeton also acknowledged that she was a pioneer of what she called "exotic dancing" - involving stripping in a bikini - in South Africa 25 years ago.

Under questioning from Hustler lawyer Dort Bigg, Keeton testified that for the first 14 of the 20 years she lived with Guccione, he was married to someone else.

Keeton concluded her testimony Tuesday afternoon.

A Penthouse vice chairman and president of Omni magazine, Keeton charges she was libeled by a pictorial of a nude woman - not Keeton - published in the September 1975 Hustler with a headline, "Is Robert Guccione still hot? Keeton - who says you're over the hill at 50?" Keeton testified she was not close to 50 years old at the time of the photo shoot.

Keeton also charges she was libeled by a cartoon in the May 1976 Hustler issue suggesting that she had infected her with gonorrhea. Keeton said she never has had venereal disease.

Keeton said she was not offended by anything that ever has appeared in Penthouse or Viva. She said the same applied to Guccione's sexually explicit movie "Caligula."

Bigg also asked Keeton about a remark she made during an appearance with Flynt on NBC's "Today" show with Tom Snyder in 1975, saying that she would have liked to appear nude in the pages of Penthouse.

"I would have loved to have my picture taken by Bob Guccione," Keeton said. "He's the most famous photographer in the world. It would have been a privilege."

Larry Flynt's colorful life and encounters with the law are the subject of a movie, The People vs. Larry Flynt, directed by acclaimed director Miloš Forman. The movie stars Woody Harrelson as Flynt, Courtney Love as Flynt's co-publisher Althea Leisure, and Edward Norton as Flynt's lawyer Alan Isaacman. NYU law professor Edward Isaacman plays the role of Roy Grutman, longtime attorney for Robert Guccione, who also represented the Rev. Jim Jones in a suit against Flynt over a scurrilous parody ad that appeared in Hustler. See Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Flynt, 46 (1988)

Johnson v. Griffin, No. 3:22-cv-000295 (M.D. Tenn., March 3, 2023)

WILLIAM L. CAMPBELL, JR., District Judge.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

On April 24, 2021, Plaintiff Samuel Johnson ("Johnson") was at a local hotel restaurant in Tennessee. An incident occurred at the hotel between Johnson and some teenagers dressed for prom. One of the teenagers took a video of the incident on their cell phone and published an edited version of the "Clip" (the "Clip") to their personal TikTok account. The complaint alleges that the Clip received significant public exposure between April 24 and April 25, 2021.

Kathy Griffin, a comedian who lives in California, tweeted about the incident on April 25, 2021. Her first tweet shared another user's video of the Clip, with that user's caption reading, "Homophobic POS in Tennessee harasses a teenager for wearing a dress to prom." One of the responses to the quoted tweet read:

If this is Sam Johnson in Nashville, Tennessee, the CEO of @VisuWell, healthcare-to-be-astronaut strategist, married to Jill Johnson where they may reside in Franklin, Tennessee, it seems like he's dying to be online famous. ^_(◊)_/^ _(◊)_/^

Later that morning, Griffin tweeted a screen shot of google image search results for “ceo visuwell” showing two headshots of Johnson along with the caption: “Who is? THIS Sam Johnson of Franklin Tennessee?” That evening, VisuWell tweeted four times via its official Twitter account about the incident:

Post 1/4: We unequivocally condemn the behavior exhibited by Sam Johnson in a recent video widely circulated on social media.

Post 2/4: After investigating the matter and speaking to the individuals involved, the VisuWell BOD has chosen to terminate Mr. Johnson from his position as CEO, effective immediately. Gerry Andrade, our President and COO, will lead the company through this important time.

Post 3/4: VisuWell’s culture emphasizes respect, kindness, and compassion, especially for those from traditionally marginalized communities, and we maintain a zero-tolerance policy for intolerance of any kind.

Post 4/4: Mr. Johnson’s actions contradicted the high standards we set for ourselves in promoting the health of those who use our platform.

In response to VisuWell’s second tweet, Griffin tweeted:

Has Sam Johnson has been removed from his position on the Board of Directors and, if not, what measures is Visuwell taking in this regard? Leaving Johnson on the Board raises an eyebrow that the company intends to rehire. Know the nation will remain vigilant. (Per @NastyProud)

VisuWell replied to Griffin minutes later, tweeting: “terminated.” The complaint alleges that Griffin’s first tweet about the incident on April 26, 2021, caused the Clip to go viral. The teenager who originally posted the Clip to his TikTok tweeted: “KATHY 😢😢 when I posted this I did NOT expect it to go viral to this extent but THANK YOU SO MUCH.” Griffin tweeted in reply:

Jacob, I’m so sorry you had to be anywhere near this thing. I was very anxious for you while watching, but am grateful you took the video (as is your right.) I’m proud to be an ally. Let me know if there’s anything I can do to help. ❤️🏳️

Plaintiffs filed the present suit against Griffin on April 25, 2022, based on diversity of citizenship and an amount in controversy exceeding $75,000.00. Plaintiffs bring state law claims for tortious interference with employment relations, common law and statutory tortious interference with contractual relations, intentional infliction of emotional distress, invasion of privacy — intrusion upon seclusion, prima facie tort, and negligence per se. Griffin filed the pending motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(2) and for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). (Doc. No. 18).

II. PERSONAL JURISDICTION

A. Legal Standard

"Motions to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(2) involve burden shifting." "The plaintiff must make out a prima facie case, which can be done merely through the complaint." "The burden of proof shifts to the defendant, whose motion to dismiss must be properly supported with evidence. Once the defendant has met the burden, it returns to the plaintiff, who may no longer rely on the pleadings but must, by affidavit or otherwise, set forth specific facts showing that the court has jurisdiction." "The court must view the pleadings and affidavits in a light most favorable to the plaintiff and not weigh the controverting assertions of the party seeking dismissal."

B. Analysis

"A federal court sitting in diversity may not exercise jurisdiction over a defendant unless a citizen of the forum state would be authorized to do so by state law—and any such jurisdiction must be compatible with the due process requirements of the U.S. Constitution." "Due process requires that an out-of-state defendant have 'minimum contacts' with the forum state sufficient to comport with 'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.'" Tennessee's long-arm statute "extends its jurisdiction to due process's limits, and the analysis of what that process is all the court must address."

Under the applicable burden shifting framework, "the first question is whether the plaintiff makes out a prima facie showing of jurisdiction." "Personal jurisdiction falls into two categories: general and specific." In responding to the pending motion, Plaintiffs argue the Court has personal jurisdiction over Griffin. "Specific jurisdiction turns on the 'affiliation between the defendant and the forum state that gives rise to the underlying controversy.'" "This requires a plaintiff to establish, with reasonable certainty, that the defendant has sufficient contacts between the defendant and the forum state." "This 'minimum contacts' analysis depends on the defendant's contact with the forum, 'not the defendant's contacts with other states or persons who reside there.'" "That means Griffin's 'suit-related conduct' must have a 'substantial connection' with Tennessee." While "a defendant may be subject to personal jurisdiction if her 'efforts are 'purposefully directed' toward residents of another state,'" the plaintiff cannot be the only link between the defendant and the forum." "These same principles apply when intentional torts are involved."

Here, Plaintiffs argue the following factual allegations make the requisite prima facie showing of specific personal jurisdiction: (1) Griffin's tweets intentionally targeted them, (2) the effects of Griffin's tortious conduct was felt in Tennessee, and (3) Griffin has done business in Tennessee at least twice by personally performing her stage act. Walden v. Fiore, 571 U.S. 277 (2007). Plaintiffs' argument that Griffin is subject to jurisdiction because her allegedly tortious conduct on social media intentionally targeted and harmed Tennessee residents. In Walden, the Supreme Court held that a federal district court in Nevada lacked jurisdiction over a Georgia resident who allegedly drafted a false affidavit about the Nevada plaintiffs knowing it would harm the plaintiffs. It was not sufficient that the plaintiffs had "strong forum connections" or "foreseeable harm" in the forum state because "the proper question is not where the plaintiff experienced a particular injury or effect but whether the defendant's conduct connected with the forum in a meaningful way."

Even viewing the factual allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs and drawing all reasonable inferences in their favor, the factual allegations in the complaint do not demonstrate that Griffin has sufficient minimum contacts with Tennessee such that jurisdiction over her would be reasonable. While Griffin's tweets expressly named Tennessee residents, a Tennessee business, and Tennessee cities, there are no allegations in the complaint that Griffin's tweets were directed at Tennessee readers, as opposed to the residents of other states, or that Griffin posted her tweets hoping to reach Tennessee specifically as opposed to her two million Twitter followers generally. Nor does the complaint allege that Griffin has any Twitter followers in Tennessee or that Tennessee was the focal point of Griffin's tweets. While Plaintiffs allege that Griffin's tweets caused third parties to threaten and dox them in Tennessee, "the Supreme Court has"consistently rejected attempts to satisfy the defendant-focused 'minimum contacts' inquiry by demonstrating contacts between third parties and the forum State." Finally, Griffin's two previous live performances in Tennessee are insufficient contacts to form the basis for this Court to exercise personal jurisdiction over Griffin in the present case because Plaintiffs' causes of action do not arise from those alleged contacts.

III. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the exercise of jurisdiction over Griffin would offend due process. Accordingly, Griffin's motion to dismiss will be GRANTED for lack of personal jurisdiction.

Ford Motor Co. v. Mont. Eighth Judicial Dist. Ct., 141 S.Ct. 1017 (2021)

Justice KAGAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

In each of these two cases, a state court held that it had jurisdiction over Ford Motor Company in a products-liability suit stemming from a car accident. The accident happened in the State where suit was brought. The victim was one of the State's residents. And Ford did substantial business in the State—among other things, advertising, selling, and servicing the model of vehicle the suit claims is defective. Still, Ford contends that jurisdiction is improper because the particular car involved in the crash was not first sold in the forum State, nor was it designed or manufactured there. We reject that argument. When a company like Ford serves a market for a product in a State and that product causes injury in the State to one of its residents, the State's courts may entertain the resulting suit.

I

Ford is a global auto company. It is incorporated in Delaware and headquartered in Michigan. But its business is everywhere. Ford markets, sells, and services its products across the United States and overseas. In this country alone, the company annually distributes over 2.5 million new cars, trucks, and SUVs to over 3,200 licensed dealerships. Ford also encourages a resale market for its products: Almost all its dealerships buy and sell used Fords, as well as selling new ones. To enhance its brand and increase its sales, Ford engages in wide-ranging promotional activities, including television, print, online, and direct-mail advertisements. No matter where you've seen them: "Have you driven a Ford lately?" or "Built Ford Tough." Ford also allows consumers to keep their vehicles running long past the date of sale. The company sells original parts to auto supply stores and repair shops across the country. (Goes against "Keep your Ford a Ford.") And Ford's own network of dealers offers an array of maintenance and repair services, thus fostering an ongoing relationship between Ford and its customers.

Accidents involving two of Ford's vehicles—a 1996 Explorer and a 1994 Crown Victoria—were at the heart of the suits before us. One case comes from Montana. Markkaya Gullett was driving her Explorer near her home in the State when the tread separated from a rear tire. The car went out of control, rolled into a ditch, and came to rest upside down. Gullett died at the scene of the accident. Her representative sued Ford in Montana state court, bringing claims for a design defect, failure to warn, and negligence. The second case comes from Minnesota. Adam Bork was a passenger in his friend's Crown Victoria, traveling on a rural road in the State to a nearby fishing spot. When his friend rear-ended a snowplow, this car too landed in a ditch. Bork's air bag failed to deploy, and he suffered serious brain damage. He sued Ford in Minnesota state court, asserting products-liability, negligence, and breach-of-warranty claims.

Ford moved to dismiss the two suits for lack of personal jurisdiction, on basic principles of due process. According to Ford, the state court (whether in Montana or Minnesota) had jurisdiction over it only if the company's conduct in the State had given rise to the plaintiff's claims. Since no causal link existed, Ford continued, only if the company had designed, manufactured, and sold—likely—sold in the State the particular vehicle involved in the accident. In neither suit could the plaintiff make that showing. Ford had designed the Explorer and Crown Victoria in Kentucky, and it had manufactured the cars in (respectively) Kentucky and Canada. The company had originally sold the cars at issue outside the forum States—the Crown Victoria in Washington, the Crown Victoria in North Dakota. Only later resales and reimports by consumers had brought the vehicles to Montana and Minnesota. That meant, in Ford's view, that the courts of those States could not decide the suits.

Both the Montana and the Minnesota Supreme Courts (affirming lower court decisions) rejected Ford's argument.

We granted certiorari to consider if Ford is subject to jurisdiction in these cases. We now answer that question.

The Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause limits a state court's power to exercise jurisdiction over a defendant. The canonical decision in this area remains International Shoe Co. v. Washington. There, the Court held that a tribunal's authority depends on the defendant having such "contacts" with the forum State that "the maintenance of the suit" is "reasonable," in the context of our federal system of government, and "does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice."

of fair play and substantial justice." In giving content to that formulation, the Court has long focused on the nature and extent of "the defendant's relationship to the forum State." That focus led to our recognizing two kinds of personal jurisdiction: general (sometimes called all-purpose) jurisdiction and specific (sometimes called case-linked) jurisdiction.

A state court may exercise general jurisdiction only when a defendant is "essentially at home" in the State. General jurisdiction, as its name implies, extends to "any and all claims" brought against a defendant. Those claims need not relate to the forum State or the defendant's activity there; they may concern events and conduct anywhere in the world. But that breadth imposes a correlative limit: Only a select "set of affiliations with a forum" will expose a defendant to such sweeping jurisdiction. what we have called the "paradigm" case, an individual is subject to general jurisdiction in her place of domicile. And the "equivalent" forums for a corporation are its place of incorporation and principal place of business. So general jurisdiction over Ford (as all parties agree) attaches in Delaware and Michigan—not in Montana and Minnesota.

Specific jurisdiction is different: It covers defendants less intimately connected with a State, but only as to a narrower class of claims. The contacts needed for this kind of jurisdiction often go by the name "purposeful availment." The defendant, we have said, must take "some act by which it purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State." The contacts must be the defendant's own choice and not "random, isolated, or fortuitous." They must show that the defendant deliberately "reached out beyond" its home—by, for example, "exploiting a market" in the forum State or entering a contractual relationship centered there. Yet even then—because the defendant is not "at home"—the forum State may exercise jurisdiction in only certain cases. The plaintiff's claims, we have often stated, "must arise out of or relate to the defendant's contacts" with the forum. Or put just a bit differently, "there must be 'an affiliation between the forum and the underlying controversy, principally, an activity or an occurrence that takes place in the forum State and is therefore subject to the State's regulation.'"

These rules derive from and reflect two sets of values—treating defendants fairly and protecting "interstate federalism." Our decision in International Shoe founded specific jurisdiction on an idea of reciprocity between a defendant and a State: When (but only when) a company "exercises the privilege of conducting activities within a state"—thus "enjoying the benefits and protection of its laws"—the State may hold the company to account for related misconduct. Later decisions have added that our doctrine similarly provides defendants with "fair warning"—knowledge that "a particular activity may subject it to the jurisdiction of a foreign sovereign." A defendant can thus "structure its primary conduct" to lessen or avoid exposure to a given State's courts. And this Court has considered alongside defendants' interests those of the States in relation to each other. One State's "sovereign power to try" a suit, we have recognized, may prevent "sister States" from exercising their like authority. The law of specific jurisdiction thus seeks to ensure that States with "little legitimate interest" in a suit do not encroach on States more affected by the controversy.

Ford contends that our jurisdictional rules prevent Montana's and Minnesota's deciding these two suits. In making that argument, Ford does not contest that it does business in Montana and Minnesota—that it actively seeks to serve the market for and related products in those States. Or to put that concession in more doctrinal terms, Ford agrees that it has "purposefully availed itself of the privilege of conducting activities in places. Ford's claim is instead that those activities do not sufficiently connect to the forum conduct. From the resident-plaintiffs' view, the needed link must be causal in nature: Jurisdiction attaches "only if the forum conduct gave rise to the plaintiff's claims." And that rule reduces, Ford thinks, specific jurisdiction in the State where Ford sold the car in question, or else the State where Ford designed and manufactured the vehicle. On that view, the place of accident is immaterial. So (Ford says) Montana's and Minnesota's courts have no power over the defendant.

But Ford's causation-only approach finds no support in this Court's requirement of a "connection" between a plaintiff's suit and a defendant's activities. That rule indeed narrows the class of claims over which a state court may exercise specific jurisdiction quite so far as Ford wants. None of our precedents has suggested that only a causal relationship between the defendant's in-state activity and the litigation will do. A more common formulation of the rule demands that the suit "arise out of or relate to" the defendant's contacts with the forum.¹ The first half of that standard asks about causation; the back half, after the "or," contemplates that some relationships will support jurisdiction without a causal showing. That does not mean anything goes. In the sphere of general jurisdiction, the phrase "relate to" incorporates real limits, as it must to adequately protect defendants foreign to a forum. But again, we have never framed the specific jurisdiction rule as always requiring proof of causation—i.e., proof that the plaintiff's claim came about as a result of the defendant's in-state conduct. So the case is not over even if, as Ford argues, the test would put jurisdiction in only the States of first sale, manufacture, and design. The defendant's State's courts may yet have jurisdiction, because of another "activity or occurrence" by the defendant that takes place in the State.

And indeed, this Court has stated that specific jurisdiction attaches in cases involving the defendant's contacts with the forum—cases like the ones here—when a company like Ford serves a market for a product in the forum and the product malfunctions there. In World-Wide Volkswagen, the Court held that a New York court could not assert jurisdiction over a New York car dealer just because a car that had been sold in New York caught fire in Oklahoma. But in so doing, we contrasted the dealer's position to that of other defendants—Audi, the car's manufacturer, and Volkswagen, the car's nationwide distributor (neither of which contested jurisdiction):

If the sale of a product of a manufacturer or distributor such as Audi or Volkswagen is not an isolated occurrence, but arises from the efforts of the manufacturer or distributor to serve directly or indirectly, the market for its product in several or all other States, it is not unreasonable to subject it to suit in one of those States if its allegedly defective merchandise has there been the cause of injury to its owner or to others.

Or said another way, if Audi and Volkswagen's business deliberately extended into Oklahoma (among other States), then Oklahoma's courts could hold the companies accountable for a car's catching fire there—even though the vehicle had been designed and made overseas and sold in New York. For, the Court explained, a company thus "purposefully availing itself" of the Oklahoma auto market "has clear notice" of its exposure in that State to suits arising from local accidents involving its cars. And the company could do something about that exposure: It could "act to alleviate the risk of burdensome litigation by procuring insurance, passing the expected costs on to customers, or, if the risks are still too great, severing its connection with the State."

Our conclusion in World-Wide Volkswagen—though, as Ford notes, technically "dicta"—has appeared and reappeared in many cases since. So, for example, the Court in Keeton invoked that part of World-Wide Volkswagen to show that when a corporation has "continuously and deliberately exploited a State's market, it must reasonably anticipate being haled into that State's courts" to defend actions "based on" products causing injury there. And in Daimler, we used the Audi/Volkswagen scenario as a paradigm case of specific jurisdiction (though now naming Daimler, the maker of Mercedes Benzes). Said the Court, to "illustrate" specific jurisdiction's "province": A California court would exercise specific jurisdiction "if a California plaintiff, injured in a California accident involving a Daimler-manufactured vehicle, sued Daimler in that court alleging that the vehicle was defectively designed." As in World-Wide Volkswagen, the Court did not limit jurisdiction to where the car was designed, manufactured, or first sold. Substitute Ford for Daimler, Montana and Minnesota for California, and the Court's "illustrative" case becomes ... the two cases before us.

To see why Ford is subject to jurisdiction in these cases (as Audi, Volkswagen, and Daimler were in their analogues), consider first the business that the company regularly conducts in Montana and Minnesota. Small wonder that Ford has here conceded "purposeful availment" of the two States' markets. By every means imaginable—among them, billboards, TV and radio spots, print ads, and direct mail—Ford urges Montanans and Minnesotans to buy its vehicles, including (at all relevant times) Explorers and Crown Victorias. Ford cars—again including those two models—are available for sale, whether new or used, throughout the States, at 36 dealerships in Montana and 84 in Minnesota. And apart from sales, Ford works hard to foster ongoing connections to its cars' owners. The company's dealers in Montana and Minnesota (as elsewhere) regularly maintain and repair Ford cars, including those whose warranties have long since expired. And the company distributes replacement parts both to its own dealers and to independent auto shops in the two States. Those activities, too, make Ford money. And by making it easier to own a Ford, they encourage Montanans and Minnesotans to become lifelong Ford drivers.

Now turn to how all this Montana-and Minnesota-based conduct relates to the claims in these cases, brought by state residents in Montana's and Minnesota's courts. Each plaintiff's suit, of course, arises from a car accident in one of those States. In each complaint, the resident-plaintiff alleges that a defective Ford vehicle—an Explorer in one, a Crown Victoria in the other—caused the crash and resulting harm. And as just described, Ford had advertised, sold, and serviced those two car models in both States for many years. (Contrast a case, which we do not address, in which Ford marketed the models in only a different State or region.) In other words, Ford had systematically served a market in Montana and Minnesota for the very vehicles that the plaintiffs allege malfunctioned and injured them in those States. So there “relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation”—the “essential fact” of specific jurisdiction. That is why this Court has used this exact fact pattern (a resiliency-susceptible global car company, extensively serving the state market in a vehicle, for an accident) as an illustration—even a paradigm example—of how specific jurisdiction can work.

The only complication here, pressed by Ford, is that the company sold the specific vehicles in question in its home States, but the accidents occurred in these crashes outside the forum States, with consumers later selling them to residents. Because that is so, Ford argues, the plaintiffs’ claims “would be precisely the same if Ford had never done anything in Montana and Minnesota.” Of course, that argument restates Ford’s demand for an exclusively causal test of connection—which we have shown is inconsistent with our caselaw. And indeed, a similar assertion could have been made in World-Wide Volkswagen—yet the Court made clear that systematic contacts rendered Audi accountable there for an in-state accident, even though it involved no contacts with New York. So too here, and for the same reasons—even supposing (as Ford does) that the company’s Montana or Minnesota contacts the plaintiffs’ claims would be just the same.

But in any event, that assumption is far from clear. For the owners of these cars have bought them, and so these suits might never have arisen, except for Ford’s contacts with their home States. Those contacts might turn any resident of Montana or Minnesota into a Ford owner—even when he buys his car from out of state. He may make that purchase because he saw ads for the car in local media. And he may take into account a raft of Ford’s promotional activities designed to make driving a Ford convenient there: that Ford dealers service the car; that other auto shops have ample supplies of Ford parts; and that there is an active resale market for its old models. The plaintiffs here did not in fact establish such causal links. Nor should jurisdiction in cases like these ride on the location of an individual plaintiff’s purchase, or on his ability to present persuasive evidence of them. But the possibilities listed above—created by the reach of Ford’s Montana and Minnesota contacts—underscore the aptness of finding jurisdiction here, even though the vehicles were first sold out of state.

For related reasons, allowing jurisdiction in these cases treats Ford fairly, as precedents explain. In conducting so much business in Montana and Minnesota, Ford “assumes the benefits and protection of their laws”—the enforcement of contracts, the defense of the resulting formation of effective markets. All that assistance to Ford’s in-state sales creates reciprocal obligations—most relevant here, that the car models Ford sells in its markets in Montana and Minnesota be safe for their citizens to use there. Thus the Court’s conclusion: A state court’s enforcement of that commitment, enmeshed as it is in the web of government-protected in-state business, can “hardly be said to be undue.” And as in Volkswagen, it cannot be thought surprising either. An automaker regularly sells a vehicle in a State, the Court said, has “clear notice” that it will be subject to jurisdiction in that State’s courts when the product malfunctions there (regardless where it was first sold), because that exercise of jurisdiction is so reasonable, it is also predictable—and thus helps to “structure its primary conduct” to lessen or even avoid the costs of state-court litigation.

⁷ (n.4 in opinion) None of this is to say that any person using any means to sell any good in a State is subject to jurisdiction there if the product malfunctions after arrival. We have long treated isolated or sporadic transactions differently from continuous ones. And we do not here consider Internet transactions, which may raise doctrinal questions of their own.

Finally, principles of “interstate federalism” support jurisdiction over these suits in Montana and Minnesota. Those States have significant interests at stake—“providing their residents with a convenient forum for redressing injuries inflicted by out-of-state actors,” as well as enforcing their own safety regulations. Consider, next to those, the interests of the States of first sale (Washington and North Dakota)—which Ford’s proposed rule would make the most likely forums. For each of those States, the suit involves all out-of-state parties, an out-of-state accident, and out-of-state injuries; the suit’s only connection with the State is that a former owner once (many years earlier) bought the car there. In other words, there is a less significant “relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation.” So by channeling these suits to Washington and North Dakota, Ford’s regime would undermine, rather than promote, what the company calls the Due Process Clause’s “jurisdiction-allocating function.”

Ford mainly relies for its rule on two of our recent decisions—Bristol-Myers and Walden. But those precedents stand for nothing like the principle Ford derives from them. If anything, they reinforce all we have said about why Montana’s and Minnesota’s courts can decide these cases.

Ford says of Bristol-Myers that it “squarely forecloses” jurisdiction. In that case, non-resident plaintiffs brought claims in California state court against Bristol-Myers Squibb, the manufacturer of a nationally marketed prescription drug called Plavix. The plaintiffs had not bought Plavix in California; neither had they used or suffered any harm from the drug there. Still, the California Supreme Court thought it could exercise jurisdiction because Bristol-Myers Squibb sold Plavix in California and was defending there against identical claims brought by the State’s residents. This Court disagreed, holding that the exercise of jurisdiction violated the Fourteenth Amendment. In Ford’s view, the same must be true here. Each of these plaintiffs, like the plaintiffs in Bristol-Myers, alleged injury from a particular item (a car, a pill) that the defendant had sold outside the forum State. Ford reads Bristol-Myers to preclude jurisdiction when that is true, even if the defendant regularly sold “the same kind of product” in the State.

But that reading misses the point of our decision. We found jurisdiction improper in Bristol-Myers because the forum State, and the defendant’s activities there, lacked any connection to the plaintiffs’ claims. The plaintiffs, the Court explained, were not residents of California. They had not been prescribed Plavix in California. They had not ingested Plavix in California. And they had not sustained their injuries in California. In short, the plaintiffs were engaged in forum-shopping—suing in California because it was thought plaintiff-friendly, even though their cases had no tie to the State. That is not at all true of the cases before us. Yes, Ford sold the specific products in other States, as Bristol-Myers Squibb had. But here, the plaintiffs are residents of the forum States. They used the allegedly defective products in the forum States. And they suffered injuries when those products malfunctioned in the forum States. In sum, each of the plaintiffs brought suit in the most natural. State—based on an “affiliation between the forum and the underlying controversy, principally, an activity or an occurrence that took place” there. So Bristol-Myers does not bar jurisdiction.

Ford falls back on Walden as its last resort. In that case, a Georgia police officer was flying from Atlanta to Las Vegas. He searched the passenger's luggage at the Atlanta airport, seized money from two Nevada residents before they got on a flight to Las Vegas. The victims of the search sued the officer in Nevada, arguing that the alleged injury (their inability to use the seized money) occurred in the State in which the officer was traveling. This Court held the exercise of jurisdiction in Nevada improper even though "the plaintiff could not have experienced the effects" of the officer's conduct there. According to Ford, our ruling in Walden means that the plaintiff's residence and place of injury can never support jurisdiction. And without those factors, Ford concludes, the basis for jurisdiction crumbles here as well.

But Walden has precious little to do with the cases before us. In Walden, only the defendant had traveled to Nevada; the plaintiff had never taken any contacts with the State of Nevada; the defendant-officer had never taken any contacts with the State of Nevada either. The officer had "never traveled to, conducted activities with anyone in, or sent anything or anyone to Nevada." So to use the language of our colleagues, the officer had not "purposefully availed himself of the privilege of conducting activities" in the State. Because that was true, the Court had no occasion to address the necessary connection between a defendant's in-state activity and the plaintiff's claims. But here, Ford has truckload of contacts with Montana and Minnesota, as it admits. The only issue is whether those contacts are related enough to the plaintiffs' suits. As to that issue, so what if (as Justice Alito notes) the place of a plaintiff's injury and residence cannot create a defendant's contact with the State? Those places still may be relevant in assessing the link between the defendant's contacts and the plaintiff's suit—including its assertions of who was injured where. After all, that relevance is a key part of Bristol-Myers' reasoning. One of Ford's own favorite citations refutes its appeal to the other.

Here, resident-plaintiffs allege that they suffered in-state injury because of defendant Ford's extensive promotional activities in those States. As Justice Alito notes, given the reasons we have given, the connection between the plaintiffs' claims and Ford's promotional activities in those States—or otherwise said, the "relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation"—is close enough to support specific jurisdiction. The judgments of the Minnesota Supreme Courts are therefore affirmed.

Justice ALITO, concurring in the judgment.

These cases can and should be decided without any alteration or refinement of the rule on specific personal jurisdiction. To be sure, for the reasons outlined in Justice Sotomayor's thoughtful opinion, there are grounds for questioning the standard that the Court established in International Shoe. And there are also reasons to wonder whether the case law developed since that time is well suited for the way in which business is now conducted. But there is nothing distinctively 21st century about the question in the cases now before us, and the answer to that question is settled by our case law.

Since International Shoe, the rule has been that a state court can exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant if the defendant has "minimum contacts" with the forum—which means that the contacts must be "such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend 'traditions of fair play and substantial justice.'"

That standard is easily met here. Ford has long had a heavy presence in Minnesota and Montana. It spends billions on national advertising. It has many franchises in both States. Ford dealers in Minnesota and Montana sell and service Ford vehicles, and Ford ships replacement parts to both States. In entertaining these suits, Minnesota and Montana courts have not reached out and grabbed suits in which they “have little legitimate interest.” Their residents, while riding in vehicles purchased within their borders, were killed or injured in accidents on their roads. Can anyone seriously argue that requiring Ford to litigate these cases in Minnesota and Montana would be fundamentally unfair?

Well, Ford makes that argument. It would send the plaintiffs packing to the jurisdictions where the vehicles in question were assembled (Kentucky and Canada), designed (Michigan), or first sold (Washington and North Dakota) or where Ford is incorporated (Delaware) or has its principal place of business (Michigan).

As might have been predicted, the Court unanimously rejects this understanding of “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.” And in doing so, we merely follow what we said in World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, which was essentially this: If a car manufacturer makes substantial efforts to sell vehicles in States A and B (and other States), and a defect in a vehicle first sold in State A causes injuries in an accident in State B, the manufacturer can be sued in State B. That rule decides these cases.

Ford, however, asks us to adopt an unprecedented rule under which a defendant’s contacts with the forum State must be proven to have been a but-for cause of the tort plaintiff’s injury. The Court properly rejects that argument, and I agree with the main thrust of the Court’s opinion. My only quibble is with the new gloss that the Court puts on our case law. Several of our opinions have said that a plaintiff’s claims “must arise out of or relate to the defendant’s contacts” with the forum. The Court parses this phrase “as though we were dealing with language of a statute,” and because this phrase is cast in the disjunctive, the Court recognizes a new category of cases in which personal jurisdiction is permitted: those in which the claims do not “arise out of” (i.e., are not caused by) the defendant’s contacts but nevertheless sufficiently “relate to” those contacts in some undefined way.

This innovation is unnecessary and, in my view, unwise. To say that the Constitution does not require the kind of proof of causation that Ford would demand—what the majority describes as a “strict causal relationship”—is not to say that no causal link of any kind is needed. And here, there is a sufficient link. It is reasonable to infer that the vehicles in question here would never have been on the roads in Minnesota and Montana if they were some totally unknown brand that had never been advertised in those States, was not sold in those States, would not be familiar to mechanics in those States, and could not have been easily repaired with parts available in those States. The whole point of those activities was to put more Fords (including those in question here) on Minnesota and Montana roads. The common-sense relationship between Ford’s activities and these suits, in other words, is causal in a broad sense of the concept, and personal jurisdiction can rest on this type of link without strict proof of the type Ford would require. When “arise out of” is understood in this way, it is apparent that “arise out of” and “relate to” overlap and are not really two discrete grounds for jurisdiction. The phrase “arise out of or relate to” is simply a way of restating the basic “minimum contacts” standard adopted in International Shoe.

Recognizing “relate to” as an independent basis for specific jurisdiction risks complications. The “ordinary meaning” of the phrase “relate to” “is a broad one.” A phrase “according to its terms is a project doomed to failure, since, as many philosopher has observed, everything is related to everything else.” To rein in this power, some limits must be found, and the Court assures us that “relate to,” as it now uses the concept, “has real limits.” But without any indication what those limits might be, I doubt that the Court will find that observation terribly helpful. Instead, what limits the potentially broad use of “relate to” is just the sort of rough causal connection I have described.

I would leave the law exactly where it stood before we took these cases, and for that reason concur in the judgment.

Justice GORSUCH, with whom Justice THOMAS conccurring in the judgment.

Since International Shoe Co. v. Washington, this Court’s cases have sought to divide the law of personal jurisdiction in two. A tribunal with “general jurisdiction” may entertain a case against the defendant. But to trigger this power, a court usually must ensure the defendant is “at home” in the forum State. Meanwhile, “specific jurisdiction” affords a narrower range of power, which applies only when the defendant “purposefully avails” itself of the opportunity to do business in the forum State and the suit “arises out of or relates to” the defendant’s contacts with the forum State.

While our cases have long admonished lower courts to keep these concepts distinct, the old guardrails have begun to look a little battered. Take general jurisdiction. If it makes sense to speak of a corporation having one or two “homes” in 1945, it seems almost quaint to insist that corporations with global reach often have massive operations spread across multiple states. To cope with these changing economic realities, this Court has begun cautiously expanding the general jurisdiction rule in “exceptional cases.”

Today’s case tests the old boundaries from another direction. Until now, many lower courts have proceeded on the premise that specific jurisdiction requires two things. First, the defendant must “purposefully avail” itself of the chance to do business in a State. Second, the plaintiff’s suit must “arise out of or relate to” the defendant’s in-state activities. Typically, courts have read this second phrase as a unit requiring at least a but-for causal link between the defendant’s in-state activities and the plaintiff’s injuries. As every first year law student learns, a but-for causal link test isn’t the most demanding. At a high level of abstraction, one might say any event that would not have happened “but for” events far and long removed.

Now, though, the Court pivots away from this understanding. Focusing on the phrase “arise out of or relate to” that so often appears in our cases, the majority asks us to parse the language “as though we were dealing with language of a statute.” In particular, the majority ignores the disjunctive conjunction “or,” and proceeds to build its entire opinion around the “arise out of” feature. The majority admits that “arise out of” may connote causation. But, it argues, that is an independent clause that does not.

Where this leaves us is far from clear. For a case to “relate to” the defendant’s forum contacts, the majority says, it is enough if an “affiliation” or “relationship” or “connection” exists between them. But what does this assortment of nouns mean? Loosed from any causation standard, we are left to guess. The majority promises that its new test “does not mean anything goes,” but that hardly tells us what does. In some cases, the new test may prove more forgiving than the old causation rule. But it’s hard not to wonder whether it may also sometimes turn out to be more demanding. Unclear too is whether, in cases like that, the majority would treat causation and “affiliation” as alternative routes to specific jurisdiction, or whether it would deny jurisdiction outright.

For a glimpse at the complications invited by today’s decision, consider its treatment of North Dakota and Washington. Those are the States where Ford first sold the allegedly defective cars at issue in the cases before us. The majority seems to suggest that, if the plaintiffs had sought to bring their suits in those States, they would have failed. The majority stresses that the “only connection” between the plaintiffs’ claims and North Dakota and Washington is the fact that former owners once bought the allegedly defective cars there. But the majority never tells us why that “connection” isn’t enough. Surely, North Dakota and Washington would contend they have a strong interest in ensuring they don’t become marketplaces for unreasonably dangerous products. Nor is it clear why the majority casts doubt on the availability of specific jurisdiction in these States without bothering to consider whether the old causation test might allow it. After all, no one doubts Ford purposefully availed itself of those markets. The plaintiffs’ injuries, at least arguably, “arose from” (or were caused by) the sale of defective cars in those places. Even if the majority’s new affiliation test isn’t satisfied, don’t we still need to ask those causation questions, or are they now to be abandoned?

Consider, too, a hypothetical the majority offers in a footnote. The majority imagines a retiree in Maine who starts a one-man business, carving and selling wooden duck decoys. In time, the man sells a defective decoy over the Internet to a purchaser in another State who is injured. We aren’t told how. (Was the decoy coated in lead paint?) But put that aside. The majority says this hypothetical supplies a useful study in contrast with our cases. On the majority’s telling, Ford’s “continuous” contacts with Montana and Minnesota are enough to establish an “affiliation” with those States; by comparison, the decoy seller’s contacts may be too “isolated” and “sporadic” to entitle an injured buyer to sue in his home State. But if this comparison highlights anything, it is only the litigation sure to follow. For between the poles of “continuous” and “isolated” contacts lie a virtually infinite number of “affiliations” waiting to be explored. And when it comes to that vast terrain, the majority supplies no meaningful guidance about what kind or how much of an “affiliation” will suffice. Nor, once more, does the majority tell us whether its new affiliation test supplants or merely supplements the old causation inquiry.

Not only does the majority’s new test risk adding new layers of confusion to our personal jurisdiction jurisprudence. The whole project seems unnecessary. Immediately after disavowing any need for a causal link between the defendant’s forum activities and the plaintiffs’ injuries, the majority proceeds to admit that such a link may be present here. The majority stresses that the Montana and Minnesota plaintiffs before us “might” have purchased their cars because of Ford’s activities in their home States. They “may” have relied on Ford’s local advertising. And they “may” have depended on Ford’s promise to furnish in-state servicers and dealers. If the majority is right about these things, that would be more than enough a but-for causal link between Ford's in-state activities and the plaintiffs' decision to buy their allegedly defective vehicles. Nor should that result come as a surprise: One such causal links to be easy to prove in suits against corporate behemoths like Ford. The euphemisms—"affiliation," "relationship," "connection"—thus seem pretty pointless.

With the old International Shoe dichotomy looking increasingly uncertain, it's hard to say how we got here and where we might be headed.

Before International Shoe, it seems due process was usually understood to guarantee that a court of competent jurisdiction could deprive a defendant of his life, liberty, or property. In turn, a court's competency normally depended on the defendant's presence in, or connection to, the sovereign's jurisdiction. But once a plaintiff was able to "tag" the defendant with personal jurisdiction, that State's courts were generally thought competent to render judgments on a claim against the defendant, whether it involved events inside or outside the State.

International Shoe's emergence may be attributable to many influences, but at least one story seems to involve the rise of corporations and interstate trade. A corporation doing business in its State of incorporation is one thing; the old physical presence rules for individual citizens were easily adaptable to them. But what happens when a corporation, created and based entirely thanks to the laws of one State, seeks the privilege of sending agents or products to another State?

Early on, many state courts held conduct like that renders an out-of-state corporation subject to suit in the second jurisdiction. And a present company could be sued for any claim, so long as a plaintiff served an employee doing corporate business within the second State. The Shoe case sought to obviate any potential question about corporate jurisdiction by requiring an out-of-state corporation to incorporate under their laws too, or at least designate an agent for service of process. Either way, the idea was to secure the out-of-state company's presence without subjecting it to suit.

Unsurprisingly, corporations soon looked for ways around rules like these. No one ever liked greeting the process server. For centuries, individuals facing imminent trial had the option to avoid it by fleeing the court's territorial jurisdiction. But this tactic proved "too American" for the American business genius, and it held some obvious disadvantages. Corporations could retain the privilege of sending their personnel and products to other jurisdictions if they lacked a charter to do business. At the same time, when confronted with lawsuits in a foreign forum, they sought to hide behind their foreign charters and deny their presence. Their strategy was to do business without being seen to do business.

Initially and routinely, state courts rejected ploys like these. But, in a series of decisions in the first half of the last century, this Court eventually provided a more receptive audience. On the one hand, the Court held that an out-of-state corporation often has a right to do business in a State unencumbered by that State's registration rules, thanks to the so-called Commerce Clause. On the other hand, the Court began invoking the Due Process Clause to restrict the circumstances in which an out-of-state corporation could be deemed personally liable. For example, the Court ruled that even an Oklahoma corporation purchasing a large amount of merchandise in New York was not “doing business” there. Perhaps advocates of this arrangement thought it promoted national economic growth. But critics questioned its fidelity to the Constitution and traditional jurisdictional principles, noting that it often left injured parties with no practical forum for their claims too.

In many ways, International Shoe sought to start over. The Court “cast aside” the old concepts of territorial jurisdiction that its own earlier decisions had seemingly twisted in favor of out-of-state corporations. At the same time, the Court also cast doubt on the idea, once pursued by many state courts, that a company “consents” to suit when it is forced to incorporate or designate an agent for receipt of process in a jurisdiction other than its home State. In place of nearly everything that had come before, the Court sought to build a new test focused on “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.”

It was a heady promise. But it is unclear how far it has really taken us. Even today, this Court usually considers corporations “at home” and thus subject to general jurisdiction in only one or two States. All in a world where global conglomerates boast of their many “headquarters.” The Court has issued these restrictive rulings, too, even though individual defendants remain subject to the old “tag” rule, allowing them to be sued on any claim anywhere they can be found. Nearly 80 years removed from International Shoe, it seems corporations continue to receive special jurisdictional protections in the name of the Constitution. Less clear is why.

Maybe, too, International Shoe just doesn’t work quite as well as it once did. For a period, its specific jurisdiction test might have seemed a reasonable new substitute for assessing corporate “presence,” a way to identify those out-of-state corporations that were simply pretending to be absent from jurisdictions where they were really transacting business. When a company “purposefully availed” itself of the benefits of another State’s market in the 1940s, it often involved sending in agents, advertising in local media, or developing a network of on-the-ground dealers, much as Ford did in these cases. But, today, even an individual retiree carving wooden decoys in Maine can “purposefully avail” himself of the chance to do business across the continent after drawing online orders to his e-Bay “store” thanks to Internet advertising with global reach. A test once aimed at keeping corporations honest about their out-of-state operations now seemingly risks hauling individuals to jurisdictions where they have never set foot.

Perhaps this is the real reason why the majority introduces us to the hypothetical decoy salesman. Yes, he arguably availed himself of a new market. Yes, the plaintiff’s injuries arguably arose from (or were caused by) the product he sold there. Yes, International Shoe’s old causation test would seemingly allow for personal jurisdiction. But maybe the majority resists that conclusion because the old test no longer seems as reliable a proxy for determining corporate presence as it once did. Maybe that’s the intuition lying behind the majority’s introduction of its new “affiliation” rule and its comparison of the Maine retiree’s “sporadic” and “isolated” sales in the plaintiff’s State and Ford’s deep “relationships” and “connections” with Montana and Minnesota.

If that is the logic at play here, I cannot help but wonder if we are destined to rehash the same questions over and over again. Perhaps all of this Court’s efforts since International Shoe, including the majority opinion in Daimler, might be understood as seeking to recreate in new terms a jurisprudence of corporate jurisdiction that was developing before this Court’s muscular intervention in the early 20th century. Perhaps it was, is, and in the end always will be about trying to figure out whether a corporate defendant’s presence or consent creates jurisdiction. International Shoe may have sought to avoid those questions. But maybe all we have done since is struggle for new words to express old ideas. Perhaps, too, none of this should come as a surprise. New technologies and new ways for a company to evade the process server will always be with us. But if our concern is with “traditions of fair play and substantial justice,” not just our personal and idiosyncratic impressions of what those traditions require, then perhaps we will always wind up asking variations of the same questions.

None of this is to cast doubt on the outcome of these cases. The parties have not argued anything in the Constitution’s original meaning or its history that might allow me to conclude that the company, seeking to do business, entered those jurisdictions through the back door. And I cannot see why, when faced with the process server, it should be allowed to do so. The real struggle here isn’t with settling on the right outcome in these cases, but with making sense of our personal jurisdiction jurisprudence and International Shoe’s doubtful dichotomy. On those scores, I readily admit that I finish these cases with more questions than I had at the start. Hopefully, future litigants and lower courts will untangle these tangles and sort out a responsible way to address the challenges posed by globalization in light of the Constitution’s text and the lessons of history.

1.3 General Jurisdiction

Daimler A.G. v. Bauman, 571 U.S. 117 (2014)

Justice GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case concerns the authority of a court in the United States to entertain a cause of action by foreign plaintiffs against a foreign defendant based on events occurring entirely outside the United States. The litigation commenced in 2004, when twenty-two Argentinian relatives filed a complaint in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California against DaimlerChrysler Aktiengesellschaft, a German public stock company, headquartered in Stuttgart, that manufactures Mercedes-Benz vehicles in Germany. The complaint alleged that during Argentina’s 1976-1983 “Dirty War,” Daimler’s Argentinian subsidiary, Mercedes-Benz Argentina (MB Argentina) collaborated with state security forces to kidnap, detain, and kill certain MB Argentina workers, among them, plaintiffs or persons closely related to them. Damages for the alleged human-rights violations were sought from Daimler under the laws of the United States, California, and Argentina. Jurisdiction over the lawsuit was predicated on California contacts of Mercedes-Benz USA, LLC (MBUSA), a subsidiary of Daimler incorporated in Delaware with its principal place of business in New Jersey. MBUSA distributes Daimler-manufactured vehicles to independent dealerships throughout the United States, including California.

The question presented is whether the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment precludes the District Court from exercising jurisdiction over Daimler in this case, given the absence of any California connection to the atrocities, perpetrators, or victims described in the complaint. Plaintiffs invoked the court's general or all-purpose jurisdiction. California, they urge, is a place where Daimler may be sued on any and all claims against it, wherever in the world the claims may arise. For example, as plaintiffs' counsel affirmed, under the proffered jurisdictional theory, if a Daimler-manufactured vehicle overturned in Poland, injuring a Polish driver and passenger, the injured parties could maintain a design defect suit in California. Exercises of personal jurisdiction so exorbitant, we hold, are barred by due process constraints on the assertion of adjudicatory authority.

In Goodyear Dunlop Tires Operations, S.A. v. Brown, we addressed the distinction between general or all-purpose jurisdiction, and specific or conduct-linked jurisdiction. As to the former, we held that a court may assert jurisdiction over a foreign corporation "to hear any and all claims against it" only when the corporation's affiliations with the State in which suit is brought are so constant and pervasive "as to render it essentially at home in the forum State." Instructed by Goodyear, we conclude Daimler is not "at home" in California, and cannot be sued there for injuries plaintiffs attribute to MB Argentina's conduct in Argentina.

I

In 2004, plaintiffs (respondents here) filed suit in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, alleging that MB Argentina collaborated with Argentinian state security forces to kidnap, detain, torture, and kill plaintiffs and their relatives during the military dictatorship in place there from 1976 through 1983, a period known as Argentina's "Dirty War." Based on those allegations, plaintiffs asserted claims under the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1330, and the Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991, as well as claims for wrongful death and intentional infliction of emotional distress under the laws of California and Argentina. The incidents recounted in the complaint center on MB Argentina's plant in Gonzalez Catán, Argentina; no part of MB Argentina's alleged collaboration with Argentinian authorities took place in California or anywhere else in the United States.

Plaintiffs' operative complaint names only one corporate defendant: Daimler, the petitioner here. Plaintiffs seek to hold Daimler vicariously liable for MB Argentina's alleged malfeasance. Daimler is a German Aktiengesellschaft (public stock company) that manufactures Mercedes-Benz vehicles in Germany and has its headquarters in Stuttgart. At times relevant to this case, MB Argentina was a subsidiary wholly owned by Daimler's predecessor in interest.

The Alien Tort Statute gives federal district courts subject matter jurisdiction over suits "by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States." The Torture Victims Protection Act ('TVPA') amended the Alien Tort Statute to establish a civil cause of action against "An individual who, under actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of any foreign nation subjects an individual to torture or subjects an individual to extrajudicial killing". In Mohamad v. Saudi Arabia, 566 U.S. 449 (2012), the Supreme Court held that the TVPA authorized suits only against individuals, not organizations. In a later case, Jesner v. Arab Bank, PLC, 138 S.Ct. 1386 (2018), the Court likewise held that the Alien Tort Statute does not authorize suits against foreign corporations.

Daimler moved to dismiss the action for want of personal jurisdiction. Opposing plaintiffs submitted declarations and exhibits purporting to demonstrate the Daimler itself in California. Alternatively, plaintiffs maintained that jurisdiction could be founded on the California contacts of MBUSA, a distinct corporate entity that to plaintiffs, should be treated as Daimler's agent for jurisdictional purposes.

MBUSA, an indirect subsidiary of Daimler, is a Delaware limited liability corporation that serves as Daimler's exclusive importer and distributor in the United States. MBUSA imports Mercedes-Benz automobiles from Daimler in Germany, then importing those vehicles to the United States, ultimately distributing them to independent dealerships located throughout the country. Although MBUSA's principal place of business is in New Jersey, MBUSA has multiple sales-based facilities, including a regional office in Costa Mesa, a Vehicle Preparation Center in Atlanta, and a Classic Center in Irvine. According to the record developed below, MBUSA is a supplier of luxury vehicles to the California market. In particular, over 10% of all sales of Mercedes-Benz vehicles in the United States take place in California, and MBUSA's California sales represent 2.4% of Daimler's worldwide sales.

The relationship between Daimler and MBUSA is delineated in a General Distribution Agreement, which sets forth requirements for MBUSA's distribution of Mercedes-Benz vehicles in the United States. That agreement established MBUSA as an "independent contractor" that "buys vehicles as an independent business for its own account." The agreement "does not make MBUSA a general or special agent, partner, joint venturer or employee of DAIMLERCHRYSLER or any Daimler-Chrysler Group Company"; MBUSA "has no authority to make binding contracts for or act on behalf of DAIMLERCHRYSLER or any DaimlerChrysler Group Company."

We granted certiorari to decide whether, consistent with the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, Daimler is amenable to suit in California courts for claims by only foreign plaintiffs and conduct occurring entirely abroad.

II

Federal courts ordinarily follow state law in determining the bounds of their jurisdiction over persons. Under California's long-arm statute, California state courts may exercise personal jurisdiction "on any basis not inconsistent with the Constitution of this state or of the United States." California's long-arm statute allows the exercise of personal jurisdiction to the limits permissible under the U.S. Constitution. We therefore inquire whether the New York holding comports with the limits imposed by federal due process.

III

In Pennoyer v. Neff, decided shortly after the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court held that a tribunal's jurisdiction over persons reaches no farther than the boundaries of the forum. In time, however, that strict territorial approach yielded to a more expansive understanding, spurred by "changes in the technology of transportation and communication, and the tremendous growth of interstate business activity."

"The canonical opinion in this area remains International Shoe, in which we held that a State may authorize its courts to exercise personal jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant if the defendant has 'certain minimum contacts with [the State] such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.'" Following International Shoe, "the relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation, rather than the mutually exclusive sovereignty of the States on which the rules of Pennoyer rest, became the central concern of the inquiry into personal jurisdiction."

International Shoe's conception of "fair play and substantial justice" presaged the development of two categories of personal jurisdiction. The first category is represented by International Shoe itself, a case in which the in-state activities of the corporate defendant "had not only been continuous and systematic, but also gave rise to the liabilities sued on." International Shoe recognized, as well, that "the commission of some single or occasional acts of the corporate agent in a state" may sometimes be enough to subject the corporation to jurisdiction in that State's tribunals with respect to suits relating to that in-state activity. Adjudicatory authority of this order, in which the suit "arises out of or relates to the defendant's contacts with the forum," is today called "specific jurisdiction."

International Shoe distinguished between, on the one hand, exercises of specific jurisdiction, as just described, and on the other, situations where a foreign corporation's "continuous corporate operations within a state are so substantial and of such a nature as to justify suit against it on causes of action arising from dealings entirely distinct from those activities." As we have since explained, "a court may assert general jurisdiction over foreign (sister-state or foreign-country) corporations to hear any and all claims against them when their affiliations with the State are so 'continuous and systematic' as to render them essentially at home in the forum State." Goodyear, 131 S.Ct. at 2851.

Our post-International Shoe opinions on general jurisdiction are few. "[The Court's] 1952 decision in Perkins v. Benguet Consol. Mining Co. remains the textbook case of general jurisdiction appropriately exercised over a foreign corporation that has not consented to suit in the forum." The defendant in Perkins, Benguet, was a company incorporated under the laws of the Philippines, where it operated gold and silver mines. Benguet ceased its mining operations during the Japanese occupation of the Philippines in World War II; its president moved to Ohio, where he kept an office, maintained the company's files, and oversaw the company's activities. The plaintiff, an Ohio resident, sued Benguet on a claim that neither arose in Ohio nor related to the corporation's activities in that State. We held that the Ohio courts could exercise general jurisdiction over Benguet without offending due process. That was so, we later noted, because "Ohio was the corporation's principal, if temporary, place of business."

The next case on point, Helicopteros, arose from a helicopter crash in Peru. Four U.S. citizens perished in that accident; their survivors and representatives brought suit in Texas state court against the helicopter's owner and operator, a Colombian corporation. That company's contacts with Texas were confined to "sending its chief executive officer to Houston for a contract-negotiation session; accepting into its New York bank account checks drawn on a Houston bank; purchasing helicopters, equipment, and training services from [a Texas-based helicopter company] for substantial sums; and sending personnel to Texas for training." 466 U.S. at 416. Notably, those contacts bore no apparent relationship to the accident that gave rise to the suit.

We held that the company's Texas connections did not resemble the "continuous and systematic" general business contacts found to exist in Perkins. "Mere purchases, even if at regular intervals," we clarified, "are not enough to warrant a State's assertion of jurisdiction over a nonresident corporation in a cause of action not related to those transactions."

Most recently, in Goodyear, we answered the question: "Are foreign subsidiaries of a parent corporation amenable to suit in state court on claims unrelated to any activities of the subsidiary in the forum State?" 131 S.Ct. at 2850. That case arose from a bus accident in Paris that killed two boys from North Carolina. The boys' parents brought a wrongful death suit in North Carolina state court alleging that the bus's tire was defectively manufactured. The complaint named as defendants not only The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, an Ohio corporation, but also Goodyear's Turkish, French, and Luxembourgian subsidiaries. Those foreign subsidiaries, which manufactured tires for sale in Europe and Asia, had no affiliation with North Carolina. A small percentage of tires manufactured by those subsidiaries were distributed in North Carolina, however, and on that ground, the North Carolina Court of Appeals held the subsidiaries amenable to the general jurisdiction of North Carolina courts.

We reversed, observing that the North Carolina court's analysis "elided the essential difference between case-specific and all-purpose (general) jurisdiction." Although the placement of the product into the stream of commerce "may bolster an affiliation germane to specific jurisdiction," we explained, such contacts "do not warrant a determination that, based on those ties alone, the forum State has general jurisdiction over a defendant." As International Shoe itself teaches, a "continuous activity of some sorts within a state is not enough to support the demand that a corporation be amenable to suits unrelated to that activity." 326 U.S. at 318. Because those foreign subsidiaries were "in no sense at home in North Carolina," we held, those subsidiaries could not be required to submit to the general jurisdiction of that State's courts.

As is evident from Perkins, Helicopteros, and Goodyear, general and specific jurisdiction followed markedly different trajectories post-International Shoe. Specific jurisdiction has cut loose from Pennoyer's sway, but we have declined to stretch general jurisdiction beyond the limits traditionally recognized. As this Court has increasingly trained on the relationship "among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation," i.e., specific jurisdiction, general jurisdiction has come to occupy a less dominant place in the contemporary scheme of things.

IV

With this background, we turn directly to the question whether Daimler's affiliations with California are sufficient to subject it to the general (all-purpose) personal jurisdiction of California's courts. In the proceedings below, the parties agreed on, or failed to contest, certain facts, which we now take as given. Plaintiffs have never attempted to fit this case into the specific jurisdiction category. Nor did plaintiffs challenge on appeal the District Court's holding that Daimler contacts with California were, by themselves, too sporadic to justify the exercise of general jurisdiction. While plaintiffs ultimately persuaded the Ninth Circuit to impute MBUSA's California contacts to Daimler on an agency theory, at no point have they maintained that MBUSA is an alter ego of Daimler.

Daimler, on the other hand, failed to object below to plaintiffs' assertion that the California courts could exercise all-purpose jurisdiction over MBUSA. We will assume then, for purposes of this decision only, that MBUSA qualifies as at home in California.

This Court has not yet addressed whether a foreign corporation may be subjected to a court's general jurisdiction based on the contacts of its in-state subsidiary.

Even if we were to assume that MBUSA is at home in California, and further to assume MBUSA's contacts are imputable to Daimler, there would still be no basis to subject Daimler to general jurisdiction in California, for Daimler's slim contacts with the State hardly render it at home there.

Goodyear made clear that only a limited set of affiliations with a forum will render a defendant amenable to all-purpose jurisdiction there. "For an individual, the paradigm forum for the exercise of general jurisdiction is the individual's domicile; for a corporation, it is an equivalent place, one in which the corporation is fairly regarded as at home." With respect to a corporation, the place of incorporation and principal place of business are "paradigm bases for general jurisdiction." Those affiliations have the virtue of being unique—that is, each ordinarily indicates only one place—as well as easily ascertainable. These bases afford plaintiffs recourse to at least one clear and certain forum in which a corporate defendant may be sued on any and all claims.

Goodyear did not hold that a corporation may be subject to general jurisdiction only in a forum where it is incorporated or has its principal place of business; it simply typed those places paradigm all-purpose forums. Plaintiffs would have us look beyond the exemplar bases Goodyear identified, and approve the exercise of general jurisdiction in every State in which a corporation "engages in a substantial, continuous, and systematic course of business." That formulation, we hold, is unacceptably grasping.

As noted, the words "continuous and systematic" were used in International Shoe to describe instances in which the exercise of specific jurisdiction would be appropriate. Turning to all-purpose jurisdiction, in contrast, International Shoe speaks of "instances in which the continuous corporate operations within a state are so substantial and of such a nature as to justify suit on causes of action arising from dealings entirely distinct from those activities." Accordingly, the inquiry under Goodyear is not whether a foreign corporation's in-forum contacts can be said to be in some sense "continuous and systematic," it is whether that corporation's "affiliations with the State are so 'continuous and systematic' as to render it essentially at home in the forum State."

Here, neither Daimler nor MBUSA is incorporated in California, nor does either entity have its principal place of business there. If Daimler's California activities sufficed to allow the court to exercise jurisdiction over this Argentina-rooted case in California, the same global reach would presumably suffice to permit jurisdiction over defendants in every other State in which MBUSA's sales are sizable. Such exorbitant exercises of general jurisdiction would scarcely permit out-of-state defendants "to structure their principal place of business with some minimum assurance as to where that conduct will and will not render them subject to suit."

It was therefore error for the Ninth Circuit to conclude that Daimler, even with MBUSA's principal place of business attributed to it, was at home in California, and hence subject to suit there on claims arising from conduct of plaintiffs having nothing to do with anything that occurred or had its principal effect outside California.

Finally, the transnational context of this dispute bears attention. The Court has emphasized, as supportive of the exercise of general jurisdiction, plaintiffs' asserted claims under the Alien Tort Statute (ATS) and the Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991 (TVPA). The decisions of this Court, however, have rendered plaintiffs' ATS and TVPA claims infrangible.

The Ninth Circuit, moreover, paid little heed to the risks to international comity and to the view of general jurisdiction posed. Other nations do not share the uninhibited exercise of personal jurisdiction advanced by the Court of Appeals in this case. Considerations of international rapport thus reinforce our determination that subjecting Daimler to the jurisdiction of courts in California would not accord with the "fair play and substantial justice" due process demands.

1.4 Consent

Carnival Cruise Lines, Inc. v. Shute, 499 U.S. 585 (1991)

JUSTICE BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court

In this admiralty case we primarily consider whether the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit correctly refused to enforce a forum-selection clause contained in the contract by petitioner Carnival Cruise Lines, Inc., to respondents Eulala and Russel Shute.

I

The Shutes, through an Arlington, Wash., travel agent, purchased passage for a 7-day cruise on petitioner's ship, the Tropicale. Respondents paid the fare to the agent who forwarded the payment to petitioner's headquarters in Miami, Fla. Petitioner then prepared the tickets and sent them to respondents in the State of Washington. The face of each ticket, at its left-hand lower corner, contained this admonition:

SUBJECT TO CONDITIONS OF CONTRACT ON LAST PAGES IMPORTANT! PLEASE READ CONTRACT ON LAST PAGES 1, 2, 3

TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF PASSAGE CONTRACT TICKET

3. (a) The acceptance of this ticket by the person or persons named hereon as passengers shall be deemed to be an acceptance and agreement by each of them of all of the terms and conditions of this Passage Contract Ticket.

8. It is agreed by and between the passenger and the Carrier that all disputes and matters whatsoever arising under, in connection with or incident to this Contract shall be litigated, if at all, in and before a Court located in the State of Florida, U. S. A., to the exclusion of the Courts of any other state or country."

The last quoted paragraph is the forum-selection clause at issue.

II

Respondents boarded the Tropicale in Los Angeles, Cal. The ship sailed to Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, and then returned to Los Angeles. While the ship was in international waters off the Mexican coast, respondent Eulala Shute was injured when she slipped on a deck mat during a guided tour of the ship's galley. Respondents filed suit against petitioner in the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington, claiming that Mrs. Shute's injuries had been caused by the negligence of Carnival Cruise Lines and its employees.

Petitioner moved for summary judgment, contending that the forum clause in respondents' tickets required the Shutes to bring their suit against petitioner in a court in the State of Florida. Petitioner contended, alternatively, that the District Court lacked personal jurisdiction over petitioner because petitioner's contacts with the State of Washington were insubstantial. The District Court granted the motion, holding that petitioner's contacts with Washington were constitutionally insufficient to support the exercise of personal jurisdiction.

The Court of Appeals reversed. Reasoning that "but for" petitioner's solicitation of business in Washington, respondents would not have taken the cruise and Mrs. Shute would not have been injured, the court concluded that petitioner had sufficient contacts with Washington to justify the District Court's exercise of personal jurisdiction.

Turning to the forum-selection clause, the Court of Appeals acknowledged that a court concerned with the enforceability of such a clause must begin its analysis with The Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U. S. 1 (1972), where this Court held that forum-selection clauses, although not "historically . . . favored," are "prima facie valid." The appellate court concluded that the forum clause should not be enforced because it “was not freely bargained.”¹⁰ Independent justification” for refusing to enforce the clause, the Court of Appeals held that there was evidence in the record to indicate that “the Shutes are physically and financially incapable of pursuing this litigation in Florida” and that the enforcement of the forum-selection clause would operate to deprive them of their day in court and thereby contravene this Court’s holding in The Bremen.

We granted certiorari to address the question whether the Court of Appeals was correct in holding that the District Court should hear respondents’ tort claim against petitioners. Although we find the forum-selection clause to be dispositive of this question, we need not reach the petitioner’s constitutional argument as to personal jurisdiction.

“Admiralty law (or maritime law) is the body of law that governs navigation and shipping. It includes substantive and procedural law.”
Wex Legal Dictionary.

We begin by noting the boundaries of our inquiry. First, this is a case in admiralty law. Second, we must determine whether the law governing the enforceability of the forum-selection clause we scrutinize. Second, we must determine whether respondents had sufficient notice of the forum selection clause before entering the contract for passage. Respondents essentially have conceded that they did not object to the forum-selection provision (“The respondents do not contest the incorporation of the forum-selection clause or the reasonableness of the communication provisions nor that the forum selection clause was reasonably communicated to the respondents, as much as three pages of fine print can be communicated”). Additionally, the Court of Appeals evaluated the enforceability of the forum clause under the assumption that the clause was “doubtful,” that respondents could be deemed to have had knowledge of the clause.

Within this context, respondents urge that the forum clause should not be enforced. They argue that, contrary to this Court’s teachings in The Bremen, the clause was not the product of a valid contract and enforcement effectively would deprive respondents of their day in court.

Both petitioner and respondents argue vigorously that the Court’s opinion in The Bremen governs this case, and each side purports to find ample support for its position in the broad-ranging language. This seeming paradox derives in large part from key factual differences between this case and The Bremen, differences that preclude an automatic application of The Bremen’s general principles to the facts here.

In The Bremen, this Court addressed the enforceability of a forum-selection clause between two business corporations. An American corporation, Zapata, made a contract with Unterweser, a German corporation, for the towage of Zapata’s oceangoing drilling rig from Louisiana to a point in the Adriatic Sea off the coast of Italy. The agreement provided that any dispute arising under the contract was to be resolved in the London Court of Justice. When a violent storm in the Gulf of Mexico seriously damaged the rig, Zapata ordered Unterweser tow the rig to Tampa, Fla., the nearest point of refuge. Thereafter, Zapata sued Unterweser in admiralty in federal court at Tampa. Citing the forum clause, Unterweser moved to dismiss. The District Court denied Unterweser's motion, and the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, sitting en banc on rehearing, and by a sharply divided vote, affirmed.

This Court vacated and remanded, stating that, in general, "a freely negotiated private international agreement, unaffected by fraud, undue influence, or overweening bargaining power, such as that involved here, should be given full effect." The Court further generalized that "in the light of present-day commercial realities and expanding international trade we conclude that the forum clause should control absent a strong showing that it should be set aside. The Court did not define precisely the circumstances that would make it unreasonable for a court to enforce a forum clause. Instead, the Court discussed a number of factors that made it reasonable to enforce the clause at issue in The Bremen and that, presumably, would be pertinent in any determination whether to enforce a similar clause.

In this respect, the Court noted that there was "strong evidence that the forum clause was a vital part of the agreement, and that it would be unrealistic to think that the parties did not conduct their negotiations, including fixing the monetary terms, with the consequences of the forum clause figuring prominently in their calculations." Further, the Court observed that it was not "dealing with an agreement between two Americans to resolve their essentially local disputes in a remote alien forum," and that in such a case, "the serious inconvenience of the contractual forum to one or both of the parties might carry greater weight in determining the reasonableness of the forum clause." The Court stated that even where the forum clause establishes a remote forum for resolution of conflicts, "the party claiming unfairness should bear a heavy burden of proof."

In applying The Bremen, the Court of Appeals in the present litigation took note of the foregoing "reasonableness" factors and rather automatically decided that the forum-selection clause was unenforceable because, unlike the parties in The Bremen, respondents are not business persons and did not negotiate the terms of the clause with petitioner. Alternatively, the Court of Appeals ruled that the clause should not be enforced because enforcement effectively would deprive respondents of an opportunity to litigate their claim against petitioner.

The Bremen concerned a "far from routine transaction between companies of two different nations contemplating the tow of an extremely costly piece of equipment from Louisiana across the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean, through the Mediterranean Sea to its final destination in the Adriatic Sea." These facts suggest that, even apart from the evidence of negotiation regarding the forum clause, it was entirely reasonable for the Court in The Bremen to have expected Unterweser and Zapata to have negotiated with care in selecting a forum for the resolution of disputes arising from their special towing contract.

In contrast, respondents' passage contract was purely routine and doubtless nearly identical to every commercial passage contract issued by petitioner and most other cruise lines. In this context, it would be entirely unreasonable for us to assume that respondents—or any other cruise passenger—would negotiate with petitioner the terms of a forum-selection clause in an ordinary commercial cruise ticket. Common sense dictates that a ticket of this kind will be a form contract the terms of which are not subject to negotiation, and that an individual purchasing the ticket will not have bargaining parity with the cruise line. But by crucial differences in the business contexts in which the respective contracts were Court of Appeals' analysis seems to us to have distorted somewhat this Court's holding in The Bremen.

In evaluating the reasonableness of the forum clause at issue in this case, we must take into account the Court of Appeals' analysis of The Bremen to account for the realities of form passage contracts. As an initial matter, we do not adopt the Court of Appeals' determination that a nonnegotiated forum clause in a form ticket contract is never enforceable simply because it is not the result of arm's-length bargaining. Including a reasonable forum clause in a form contract of this kind is permissible for several reasons: First, a cruise line has a special interest in limiting the number of forums in which it potentially could be subject to suit. Because a cruise ship typically carries passengers from many locales, it is not unlikely that a mishap on a cruise could subject the cruise line to litigation in several different fora. Additionally, a clause establishing ex ante the place where disputes are to be resolved has the salutary effect of dispelling any confusion about where a dispute from the contract must be brought and defended, sparing litigants the time and expense of pretrial motions to determine the correct forum and conserving judicial resources that otherwise would be devoted to deciding those motions. Finally, it stands to reason that passengers who purchase tickets containing a forum clause like that at issue in this case will benefit in the form of reduced fares reflecting the savings that the cruise line enjoys by limiting the forums in which it may be sued.

We also do not accept the Court of Appeals' "independent justification" for its conclusion that the forum clause in the Shutes' ticket is invalid. The Court of Appeals' holding in The Bremen dictates that the clause should not be enforced because "there is even less record to indicate that the Shutes are physically and financially incapable of pursuing their claims in Florida than there was in The Bremen." We do not defer to the Court of Appeals' findings of fact. In this case, however, the District Court made no finding of personal jurisdiction over petitioner, the District Court made no finding regarding the physical and financial impediments to the Shutes' pursuing their claims in Florida. The Court of Appeals' conclusory reference to the record provides no basis for us to validate the finding of inconvenience. Furthermore, the Court of Appeals did not place in context this Court's statement in The Bremen that "the serious inconvenience of the choice of forum to one or both of the parties might carry greater weight in determining the reasonableness of the forum clause." The Court made this statement in evaluating a hypothetical dispute between two Americans to resolve their essentially local disputes in a remote alien forum. In the present case, Florida is not a "remote alien forum," nor—given the fact that Mrs. Shutes' accident occurred off the coast of Mexico—is this dispute an essentially local one inherently more amenable to resolution in the State of Washington than in Florida. In light of these distinctions, because respondents do not claim lack of notice of the forum clause, we conclude that they have not satisfied the "heavy burden of proof" required to set aside the clause on grounds of inconvenience.

It bears emphasis that forum-selection clauses contained in form passage contracts are subject to judicial scrutiny for fundamental fairness. In this case, there is no indication that the parties chose to set Florida as the forum in which disputes were to be resolved as a means of discouraging passengers from pursuing legitimate claims. Any suggestion of such a bad-faith motivation is supported by two facts: Petitioner has its principal place of business in Florida, and many depart from and return to Florida ports. Similarly, there is no evidence that petitioner obtained respondents' accession to the forum clause by fraud or overreaching. Finally, respondents have conceded that they were given notice of the forum provision and, therefore, presumably retained the option of rejecting the contract with impunity. In the case before us, therefore, we conclude that the Court of Appeals erred in refusing to enforce the forum-selection clause.

Does this really "stand to reason"? What is the basis for the Court's assertion? Assuming the assertion is correct, why does it matter?

V

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL joins, dissenting.

The Court prefacing its legal analysis with a factual statement that implies that a purchaser of a Carnival Cruise Lines passenger ticket is fully and fairly notified about the existence of the choice of forum clause in the fine print on the back of the ticket. Even if this implication were accurate, I would disagree with the Court's analysis. But, given the Court's preface, I begin my dissent by noting that only the most meticulous passenger is likely to become aware of the forum-selection provision. I have therefore appended to this opinion a facsimile of the relevant text, using the type size that actually appears in the ticket itself. A careful reader will find the forum-selection clause in the 8th of the 25 numbered paragraphs.

Of course, many passengers, like the respondents in this case, will not have an opportunity to read paragraph 8 until they have actually purchased their tickets. By this point, the passengers will already have accepted the condition set forth in paragraph 16(a), which provides that "the Carrier shall not be liable to make any refund to passengers in respect of . . . tickets wholly or partly not used by a passenger." Not knowing whether or not that provision is legally enforceable, I assume that the average passenger would accept the risk of having to file suit in Florida in the event of an injury, rather than canceling—without a refund—a planned vacation at the last minute. The fact that the cruise line can reduce its litigation costs, and therefore its liability insurance premiums, by forcing this choice on its passengers does not, in my opinion, suffice to render the provision reasonable.

Even if passengers received prominent notice of the forum-selection clause before they committed the cost of the cruise, I would remain persuaded that the clause was unenforceable under traditional principles of federal admiralty law and is "null and void" under the terms of Limitation of Vessel Owner's Liability Act, which was enacted in 1936 to invalidate expressly stipulations limiting shipowners' liability for negligence.

Exculpatory clauses in passenger tickets have been around for a long time. These clauses are typically the product of disparate bargaining power between the carrier and the passenger, and they undermine the strong public interest in deterring negligent conduct. For these reasons, courts long before the turn of the century consistently held such clauses unenforceable under federal admiralty law. Thus, in a case involving a ticket provision purporting to limit the shipowner's liability for the negligent handling of baggage, this Court wrote:

It is settled in the courts of the United States that exemptions limiting carriers from responsibility for the negligence of themselves or their servants are both unjust and unreasonable, and are deemed as wanting in the element of voluntary assent; and, besides, that such conditions conflict with public policy. This doctrine was announced so long ago, and has been so reiterated, that it is elementary.

Clauses limiting a carrier's liability or weakening the passenger's right to recover for negligence of the carrier's employees come in a variety of forms. Complete exemption of the carrier from liability for negligence or limitations on the amount of the potential damages are two such provisions. Requirements that notice of claims be filed within an unreasonably short period of time, and provisions mandating a choice of law that is favorable to the defendant in negligence cases, are other examples. Forum-selection clauses are all similarly designed to put a thumb on the carrier's side of justice.

Forum-selection clauses in passenger tickets involve the intersection of two areas of law: traditional contract law that qualify the general rule that courts will enforce the terms of a contract as written. Pursuant to the first strand, courts traditionally have rejected heightened scrutiny of the terms of contracts of adhesion, form contracts offered by one party to another leave basis by a party with stronger bargaining power to a party with weaker bargaining power. Commentators have questioned whether contracts of adhesion can justifiably be enforced under traditional contract theory because the adhering party generally enters into the contract without manifesting knowing and voluntary consent to all their terms.

The common law, recognizing that standardized form contracts account for a significant portion of all commercial agreements, has taken a less extreme position and instead subjected contracts of adhesion to scrutiny for reasonableness. Judge J. Skelly Wright set out the law succinctly in Williams v. Walker-Thomas Furniture Co., 350 F.2d 445, 449-450 (5th Cir. 1965).

Ordinarily, one who signs an agreement without full knowledge of its terms might be held liable for the risk that he has entered a one-sided bargain. But when a party of little bargaining power, and hence little real choice, signs a commercially unreasonable contract with little or no knowledge of its terms, it is hardly likely that his consent, or even an objective manifestation of his consent, has ever been given to all of the terms. In such a case the usual rule that the terms of the agreement are not to be questioned should be abandoned and the court should consider whether the terms of the contract are so unfair that enforcement should be withheld.

The second doctrinal principle implicated by forum-selection clauses is the traditional rule that "contractual provisions, which seek to limit the place or court in which an action may be brought, are invalid as contrary to public policy." Although adherence to this general rule has declined in recent years, particularly following our decision in The Bremen v. Zapata Corp., the prevailing rule is still that forum-selection clauses are not enforceable if they do not freely bargained for, create additional expense for one party, or deny one party a trial at home. A forum-selection clause in a standardized passenger ticket would clearly be unenforceable under the common law before our decision in The Bremen, and, in my judgment, remains unenforceable under the prevailing rule today.

The Bremen, which the Court effectively treats as controlling this case, had nothing to say about stipulations printed on the back of passenger tickets. That case involved the enforceability of a forum-selection clause in a freely negotiated international agreement between two large corporations providing for the towage of a vessel from the Gulf of Mexico to the Adriatic Sea. The Court recognized that such towage agreements had generally been held unenforceable in American but held that the doctrine of those cases did not extend to commercial arrangements between parties with equal bargaining power.

Mallory v. Norfolk Southern Railway Co., No. 21-1168 (U.S. June 27, 2023)

Justice Gorsuch announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I and III-B, and an opinion with respect to Parts II, III-A, and IV, in which Justice Thomas, Justice Sotomayor, and Justice Jackson join.

Imagine a lawsuit based on recent events. A few months ago, a Norfolk Southern train derailed in Ohio near the Pennsylvania border. Its cargo? Hazardous chemicals. Some poured into a nearby creek; some burst into flames. In the aftermath, many residents reported unusual symptoms. Suppose an Ohio resident sued the train conductor seeking compensation for an illness attributed to the accident. Suppose, too, that the plaintiff served his complaint on the conductor across the border in Pennsylvania. Everyone before us agrees a Pennsylvania court could hear that lawsuit consistent with the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court could do so even if the conductor was a Virginia resident who just happened to be passing through Pennsylvania when the process server caught up with him.

Now, change the hypothetical slightly. Imagine the same Ohio resident brought the same suit in the same Pennsylvania state court, but this time against Norfolk Southern. Assume, too, the company has filed paperwork consenting to appear in Pennsylvania courts as a condition of registering to do business in the Commonwealth. Could a Pennsylvania court hear that case too? You might think so. But today, Norfolk Southern argues that the Due Process Clause entitles it to a more favorable rule, one shielding it from suits even its employees must answer. We reject the company's argument. Nothing in the Due Process Clause requires such an incongruous result.

I

Robert Mallory worked for Norfolk Southern as a freight-car mechanic for nearly 20 years, first in Ohio, then in Virginia. During his time with the company, Mr. Mallory contends, he was responsible for spraying boxcar pipes with asbestos and handling chemicals in the railroad's paint shop. He also demolished car interiors that, he alleges, contained carcinogens.

After Mr. Mallory left the company, he moved to Pennsylvania for a period before Virginia. Along the way, he was diagnosed with cancer. Attributing his illness to Norfolk Southern, Mr. Mallory hired Pennsylvania lawyers and sued his former Pennsylvania state court under the Federal Employers' Liability Act. That law creates a compensation scheme permitting railroad employees to recover damages for their negligence.

Norfolk Southern resisted Mr. Mallory's suit on constitutional grounds. By the time of the complaint, the company observed, Mr. Mallory resided in Virginia. His complaint argued that he was exposed to carcinogens in Ohio and Virginia. Meanwhile, the company was incorporated in Virginia and had its headquarters there too. On these facts, Norfolk Southern submitted, any effort by a Pennsylvania court to exercise personal jurisdiction over it would offend the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Mr. Mallory saw things differently. He noted that Norfolk Southern manages over 20,000 miles of track, operates 11 rail yards, and runs 3 locomotive repair shops in Pennsylvania. He pointed out that Norfolk Southern has registered to do business in Pennsylvania in light of its "systematic, and extensive" operations there. That is significant, Mr. Mallory argued, because Pennsylvania requires out-of-state companies that register to do business in the Commonwealth to agree to appear in its courts on "any cause of action" against them. By complying with this statutory scheme, Mr. Mallory contended, Norfolk Southern had consented to jurisdiction in Pennsylvania on claims just like his.

Ultimately, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court sided with Norfolk Southern. Yes, the Court correctly read Pennsylvania law. It requires an out-of-state firm to answer any suit if it wants to exchange for status as a registered foreign corporation and the benefits that entail. But the Court held, Mr. Mallory could not invoke that law because it violates the Due Process Clause. In reaching this conclusion, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court acknowledged its disagreement with the Georgia Supreme Court, which had recently rejected a similar due process argument against a corporate defendant.

In light of this split of authority, we agreed to hear this case and decide whether the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits a State from requiring an out-of-state corporation to consent to personal jurisdiction to do business there.

II

The question before us is not a new one. In truth, it is a very old question—and one that was resolved in Pennsylvania Fire Ins. Co. v. Gold Issue Mining & Milling Co., 277 U.S. 93 (1917). There, the Court unanimously held that laws like Pennsylvania's comity statute violate the Due Process Clause. Some background helps explain why the Court reached the result it did.

Both at the time of the founding and the Fourteenth Amendment's adoption, the American legal tradition recognized that a tribunal's competence was generally constrained by the "territorial limits" of the sovereign that created it. That principle applied to all types of actions, but cashed out differently based on the object of the court's attention. So, for example, an action in rem that claimed an interest in immovable property was usually treated as action that could be brought only in the jurisdiction where the property was located. Meanwhile, an in personam suit against an individual “for injuries that might have happened anywhere” was generally considered a “transitory” action that followed the individual. All of which meant that a suit could be maintained by anyone on any claim in any place the defendant could be found.

American courts routinely followed these rules. Chief Justice Marshall, for one, was careful to distinguish between local and transitory actions in a case brought by a Virginia plaintiff against a Kentucky defendant based on a fraud perpetrated in Ohio. Because the action was a transitory one that followed the individual, he held, the suit could be maintained “wherever the defendant may be found.”

This rule governing transitory actions still applies to natural persons today. Some call it “tag” jurisdiction. And our leading case applying the rule is not so old. See Burnham v. Superior Court of Cal., County of Marin, 495 U.S. 604 (1990). The case began with Dennis Burnham’s business trip to California. During his short visit, Mr. Burnham’s estranged wife served him with a summons to appear in California state court for divorce proceedings. This Court unanimously approved the state court’s exercise of personal jurisdiction over Mr. Burnham as consistent with the Due Process Clause—and did so even though the Burnhams had spent nearly all their married life in New Jersey and Mr. Burnham still resided there.

As the use of the corporate form proliferated in the 19th century, the question arose how to adapt the traditional rule about transitory actions for individuals to artificial persons created by law. Unsurprisingly, corporations did not relish the prospect of being haled into court for any claim anywhere they conducted business. “No one, after all, has ever liked greeting the process server.” Corporations chartered in one State sought the right to send their sales agents and products freely into other States. At the same time, when confronted with lawsuits in those other States, some firms sought to hide behind their foreign character and deny their presence to defeat the court’s jurisdiction.

Lawmakers across the country soon responded to these stratagems. Relevant here, both before and after the Fourteenth Amendment’s ratification, they adopted statutes requiring out-of-state corporations to consent to in-state suits in exchange for the rights to exploit the local market and to receive the full range of benefits enjoyed by in-state corporations. These statutes varied. In some States, out-of-state corporate defendants were required to agree to answer suits brought by in-state plaintiffs. In other States, corporations were required to consent to suit if the plaintiff’s cause of action arose within the State, even if the plaintiff happened to reside elsewhere. Still other States (and the federal government) omitted both of these limitations. They required all out-of-state corporations that registered to do business in the forum to agree to defend themselves there against any manner of suit. Yet another group of States applied this all-purpose-jurisdiction rule to a subset of corporate defendants, like railroads and insurance companies. Mr. Mallory has collected an array of these statutes, enacted between 1835 and 1915, in his statutory appendix.

Unsurprisingly, some corporations challenged statutes like these on various grounds, including due process included. And, ultimately, one of these disputes reached this Court in Pennsylvania Fire Ins. Co. v. Gold Issue Mining & Milling Co.

That case arose this way. Pennsylvania Fire was an insurance company incorporated under the laws of Pennsylvania. In 1909, the company executed a contract in Colorado to insure a mine located near the town of Cripple Creek owned by the Gold Issue Mining & Milling Co., an Arizona corporation. Less than a year later, lightning struck and a fire destroyed the insured facility. When Gold Issue Mining sought to collect on its policy, Pennsylvania Fire refused to pay. So, Gold Issue Mining sued. But it did not sue where the contract was formed (Colorado), or in its home State (Arizona), or even in the insurer's home State (Pennsylvania). Instead, Gold Issue Mining brought its claim in a Missouri state court. Pennsylvania Fire objected to the forum. It said the Due Process Clause spared it from having to answer in Missouri's courts, which had no connection to the State.

The Missouri Supreme Court disagreed. It first observed that Missouri law required an out-of-state insurance company "desiring to transact any business" in the State to file a certificate of authority, agreeing to (1) appoint a state official to serve as the company's agent for service of process, and (2) accept service on that official as valid in any suit. For more than a decade, Pennsylvania Fire had complied with the law, as it had "desired to transact business" in Missouri "purely for the purpose of carrying on its business thereunder and of complying with the laws thereof." And Gold Issue Mining had served process on the appropriate state officer in accordance with the law required.

As to the law's constitutionality, the Missouri Supreme Court carefully reviewed the precedents and found they "clearly" supported "sustaining the proceeding." The Missouri Supreme Court explained that its decision was also supported by "the origin, growth, and development of transitory actions in England, and their importation, adoption, and expansion into the United States." It stressed, too, that the law had long permitted suits against individuals in any place where they could be found, no matter where the underlying cause of action happened to arise. What sense would it make to treat a fictitious corporate person differently? For all these reasons, the court concluded, Pennsylvania Fire "had due process of law, regardless of the place in the nation where the cause of action arose."

Dissatisfied with this answer, Pennsylvania Fire turned here. Writing for a unanimous Court, Justice Holmes had little trouble dispatching the company's due process argument. According to the Court's precedents, there was "no doubt" Pennsylvania Fire could be sued in Missouri as an out-of-state plaintiff on an out-of-state contract because it had agreed to accept service of process in Missouri on any suit as a condition of doing business there. Indeed, the Court noted, the matter so settled by existing law that the case "hardly" presented an "open" question. The Court acknowledged that the outcome might have been different if the corporation had not appointed an agent for service of process in Missouri, given this Court's earlier decision in Wayne Mut. Life Assn. of Indianapolis v. McDonough. But the Court thought that McDonough "left untouched" the principle that due process allows a corporation to be sued on a cause of action in a State where it has appointed an agent to receive whatever suits may come. The Court deemed unnecessary to say more because the company's objections had been resolved "at the bar of the judgment of the court below."

That assessment was understandable. Not only had the Missouri Supreme Court issued a thoughtful opinion. Not only did a similar rule apply to transitory actions against individuals. Other leading judges, including Learned Hand and Benjamin Cardozo, had reached similar conclusions in similar cases in the years leading up to Pennsylvania Fire. In the years following Pennsylvania Fire, too, this Court reaffirmed its holding as often as the issue arose.

Pennsylvania Fire controls this case. Much like the Missouri law at issue there, the Pennsylvania law at issue here provides that an out-of-state corporation “may not do business in this Commonwealth until it registers with” the Department of State. As part of the registration process, a corporation must identify an “office” it will “continuously maintain” in the Commonwealth. Upon completing these requirements, the corporation “shall enjoy the same rights and privileges as a domestic entity and shall be subject to the same liabilities, restrictions, duties and penalties imposed on domestic entities.” Among other things, Pennsylvania law is explicit that “qualification as a foreign corporation” shall permit state courts to “exercise general personal jurisdiction” over a registered foreign corporation, just as they can over domestic corporations.

Norfolk Southern has complied with this law for many years. In 1998, the company registered to do business in Pennsylvania. Acting through its Corporate Secretary as a “duly authorized officer,” the company completed an “Application for Certificate of Authority” from the Commonwealth “in compliance with” state law. As part of that process, the company named a “Commercial Registered Office Provider” in Philadelphia County, agreeing that this was where it “shall be deemed located.” The Secretary of the Commonwealth approved the application, conferring on Norfolk Southern both the benefits and burdens shared by domestic corporations—including amenability to suit in state court on any claim. Since 1998, Norfolk Southern has regularly updated its information on file with the Secretary. In 2009, for example, the company advised that it had changed its Registered Office Provider and would now be deemed located in Dauphin County. All told, then, Norfolk Southern has agreed to be found in Pennsylvania and answer any suit there for more than 20 years.

Pennsylvania Fire held that suits premised on these grounds do not deny a defendant due process of law. Even Norfolk Southern does not seriously dispute that much. It concedes that it registered to do business in Pennsylvania, that it established an office there to receive service of process, and that in doing so it understood it would be amenable to suit on any claim. Of course, Mr. Mallory no longer lives in Pennsylvania and his cause of action did not accrue there. But none of that makes any more difference than the fact that Gold Issue Mining was not from Missouri (but from Arizona) and its claim did not arise there (but in Colorado). To decide this case, we need not speculate whether any other statutory scheme and set of facts would suffice to establish consent to suit. It is enough to acknowledge that the state law and facts before us fall squarely within Pennsylvania Fire’s rule.

In the proceedings below, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court seemed to re~~Pennsylvania Fire~~ dictated an answer in Mr. Mallory's favor. Still, it ruled for Norfolk anyway. It did so because, in its view, intervening decisions from this Court had "overruled" Pennsylvania Fire. But in following that course, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court clearly erred. As this Court has explained: "If a precedent of this Court has directed a lower court in a case," as Pennsylvania Fire does here, a lower court "should follow the case without departing from it unless the lower court thinks that the precedent conflicts with other controls, leaving to this Court the prerogative of overruling its own decisions." This is true even if the lower court thinks the precedent is in tension with "some other line of decision."¹⁰

Now before us, Norfolk Southern candidly asks us to do what the Pennsylvania Supreme Court could not—overrule Pennsylvania Fire. To smooth the way, Norfolk Southern suggests that the Court's decision in *International Shoe Co. v. Washington*¹¹ has already done much of the work for us. That decision, the company insists, seriously undermined Pennsylvania Fire's foundations. We disagree. The two precedents sit comfortably side by side.

A

Start with how Norfolk Southern sees things. On the company's telling, echoed by the International Shoe held that the Due Process Clause tolerates two (and only two) bases for personal jurisdiction over a corporate defendant. First, "specific jurisdiction" permits suits "arise out of or relate to" a corporate defendant's activities in the forum State. Second, "general jurisdiction" allows all kinds of suits against a corporation, but only in States where the corporation is incorporated or has its "principal place of business." After International Shoe, Norfolk Southern insists, no other bases for personal jurisdiction over a corporate defendant are permissible.

But if this account might seem a plausible summary of some of our International Shoe jurisprudence, it oversimplifies matters. Here is what really happened in International Shoe. A citizen of the State of Washington sued a corporate defendant in state court for claims based on the defendant's activities even though the defendant had not registered to do business in Washington and had not agreed to be present and accept service of process there. Despite this, the Court ruled that the suit against the company comported with due process. In doing so, the Court reasoned that the Fourteenth Amendment "permits" suits against a corporate defendant that has not "present within the territorial jurisdiction of a court," so long as "the quality and nature of the company's activity" in the State "make it reasonable and just" to maintain suit there. Thus, even without agreeing to be present, the out-of-state corporation was still amenable to suit in Washington consistent with "fair play and substantial justice"—terms the Court borrowed from Justice Holmes, the author of Pennsylvania Fire.

In reality, then, all International Shoe did was stake out an additional road to jurisdiction over out-of-state corporations. Pennsylvania Fire held that an out-of-state corporation that has consented to in-state suits in order to do business in the forum is susceptible to suit there. International Shoe held that an out-of-state corporation that has not consented to in-state suits may also be susceptible to claims in the forum State based on "the quality and nature of the company's activity."

activity” in the forum. Consistent with all this, our precedents applying International Shoe have long spoken of the decision as asking whether a state court may exercise jurisdiction over a corporate defendant “that has not consented to suit in the forum.” Our precedents have recognized, too, that “express or implied consent” can continue to ground personal jurisdiction—and consent may be manifested in various ways by word or deed.

That Norfolk Southern overreads International Shoe finds confirmation in that decision’s emphasis on “fair play and substantial justice.” Sometimes, International Shoe said, the nature of a company’s in-state activities will support jurisdiction over a nonconsenting corporation when those activities “give rise to the liabilities sued on.” Other times, it added, suits “on causes of action arising from dealings entirely distinct from [the company’s] activities” in the forum State may be appropriate. These passages may have pointed the way to what (much) later cases would label “specific jurisdiction” over claims related to in-forum activities and “general jurisdiction” in places where a corporation is incorporated or headquartered. But the fact remains that International Shoe itself eschewed any “mechanical or quantitative” test and instead endorsed a flexible approach focused on “the fair and orderly administration of the laws which it was the purpose of the due process clause to insure.” Unquestionably, too, International Shoe saw this flexible standard as expanding—not contracting—state court jurisdiction. As we later put the point: “The immediate effect of [International Shoe] was to increase the ability of the state courts to obtain personal jurisdiction over nonresident defendants.” Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186, 204 (1977).

Given all this, it is no wonder that we have already turned aside arguments very much like Norfolk Southern’s. In Burnham, the defendant contended that International Shoe implicitly overruled the traditional tag rule holding that individuals physically served in a State are subject to suit there for claims of any kind. This Court rejected that submission. Instead, as Justice Scalia explained, International Shoe simply provided a “novel” way to secure personal jurisdiction that did nothing to displace other “traditional ones.” What held true there must hold true here.

Norfolk Southern offers several replies, but none persuades. The company begins by pointing to this Court’s decision in Shaffer. There, as the company stresses, the Court indicated that “prior decisions inconsistent with” International Shoe “are overruled.” True as that statement may be, however, it only poses the question whether Pennsylvania Fire is “inconsistent with” International Shoe. And, as we have seen, it is not. Instead, the latter decision expanded upon the traditional grounds of personal jurisdiction recognized by the former. This Court has previously cautioned litigants and lower courts against (mis)reading Shaffer as suggesting that International Shoe discarded every traditional method for securing personal jurisdiction that came before. We find ourselves repeating the admonition today.

Next, Norfolk Southern appeals to the spirit of our age. After International Shoe, it says, the “primary concern” of the personal jurisdiction analysis is “treating defendants fairly.” And on the company’s telling, it would be “unfair” to allow Mr. Mallory’s suit to proceed in Pennsylvania because doing so would risk unleashing “local prejudice” against a company that is “not ‘local’ in the eyes of the community.”

But if fairness is what Norfolk Southern seeks, pause for a moment to measure this against that standard. When Mr. Mallory brought his claim in 2017, Norfolk Southern had been doing business in Pennsylvania for many years. It had established an office for receipt of process. It had done so pursuant to a statute that gave the company the right to do business in-state in return for agreeing to answer any suit against it. And the company has taken advantage of its opportunity to do business in the Commonwealth, boasting of its way:

All told, when Mr. Mallory sued, Norfolk Southern employed nearly 5,000 people in Pennsylvania. It maintained more than 2,400 miles of track across the Commonwealth. Its 70-acre locomotive shop there was the largest in North America. Contrary to what it says in its brief here, the company even proclaimed itself a proud part of “the Pennsylvania Community.” By 2020, too, Norfolk Southern managed more miles of track in Pennsylvania than in any other State. And it employed more people in Pennsylvania than it did in Virginia, where its headquarters was located. Nor are we conjuring these statistics out of thin air. The company itself highlighted its “intrastate activities” in the proceedings below. 266 A.3d, at 560, 563 (discussing the firm’s “extensive operations in Pennsylvania,” including “2,278 miles of track,” “eleven rail yards,” and “three locomotive repair shops”). Given all this, on what plausible account could International Shoe’s concerns with “fair play and substantial justice” require a Pennsylvania court to turn aside Mr. Mallory’s suit?

Perhaps sensing its arguments from fairness meet a dead end, Norfolk Southern ultimately heads in another direction altogether. It suggests the Due Process Clause separately prohibits one State from infringing on the sovereignty of another State through exorbitant claims of personal jurisdiction. And, in candor, the company is half right. Some of our personal jurisdiction cases have discussed the federalism implications of one State’s assertion of jurisdiction over the corporate residents of another. But that neglects an important part of the story. To date, our personal jurisdiction cases have never found a Due Process Clause problem sounding in federalism when an out-of-state defendant submits to suit in the forum State. After all, personal jurisdiction is a personal defense that may be waived or forfeited.

That leaves Norfolk Southern one final stand. It argues that it has not really submitted to proceedings in Pennsylvania. The company does not dispute that it has filed paperwork with Pennsylvania seeking the right to do business there. It does not dispute that it has established an office in the Commonwealth to receive service of process on any claim. It does not dispute that it appreciated the jurisdictional consequences attending these actions and proceeded anyway, presumably because it thought the benefits outweighed the costs. But, in the name of the Due Process Clause, Norfolk Southern insists we should dismiss all that as a raft of meaningless formalities.

Taken seriously, this argument would have us undo not just Pennsylvania Fire but a legion of precedents that attach jurisdictional consequences to what some might dismiss as mere formalities. Consider some examples we have already encountered. In a typical general jurisdiction case under International Shoe, a company is subject to suit on any claim in a forum State only because of its decision to file a piece of paper there (a certificate of incorporation). The firm is amenable to suit even if all of its operations are located elsewhere and even if its certificate only sits collecting dust on an office shelf for years thereafter. Then there is the tag rule. The invisible state line might seem a trivial thing. But when an individual takes one step off a plane after flying from New Jersey to California, the jurisdictional consequences are immediate and serious.

Consider, too, just a few other examples. A defendant who appears “specially” jurisdiction preserves his defense, but one who forgets can lose his. Failing to certain pre-trial court orders, signing a contract with a forum selection clause, acc state benefit with jurisdictional strings attached—all these actions as well can have profound consequences for personal jurisdiction.

The truth is, under our precedents a variety of “actions of the defendant” that may technicalities nonetheless can “amount to a legal submission to the jurisdiction of was so before International Shoe, and it remains so today. Should we overrule them? Norfolk Southern’s argument seriously would require just that. But, tellingly, the court does not follow where its argument leads or even acknowledge its implications. Instead, Southern asks us to pluck out and overrule just one longstanding precedent that we dislike. We decline the invitation. There is no fair play or substantial justice in that.

Not every case poses a new question. This case poses a very old question indeed—one that was resolved more than a century ago in Pennsylvania Fire. Because that decision remains good law, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is vacated, and the case is remanded.

Justice Barrett, with whom The Chief Justice, Justice Kavanaugh, and Justice Kavanaugh join, dissenting.

For 75 years, we have held that the Due Process Clause does not allow state courts to exercise general jurisdiction over foreign defendants merely because they do business there. See International Shoe Co. v. Washington. Pennsylvania nevertheless claims general jurisdiction over all corporations that lawfully do business within its borders. As the Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania recognized, that flies in the face of our precedent. See Daimler AG v. Bauman.

The Court finds a way around this settled rule. All a State must do is compel a company to register to conduct business there (as every State does) and enact a law making a general law sufficient for suit on any cause (as every State could do). Then, every company doing business in the State is subject to general jurisdiction based on implied “consent”—not consent that includes suits, like this one, with no connection whatsoever to the forum.

Such an approach does not formally overrule our traditional contacts-based theory of personal jurisdiction, but it might as well. By relabeling their long-arm statutes, States can manufacture “consent” to personal jurisdiction. Because I would not permit states to circumvent constitutional limits so easily, I respectfully dissent.

Personal jurisdiction is the authority of a court to issue a judgment that binds a defendant. When a defendant submits to a court’s authority, the court automatically acquires personal jurisdiction over that defendant. But if a defendant contests the court’s authority, the court must determine whether it nevertheless assert coercive power over the defendant. That calculus turns first on or rule defining the persons within the court's reach. It depends next on the Due Process Clause, which guards a defendant's right to resist the judicial authority of a sovereign to which it has an insufficient tie. The Clause has the companion role of ensuring that state courts "do not reach out beyond the limits imposed on them by their status as coequal sovereigns in a federal system."

Our precedent divides personal jurisdiction into two categories: specific and general. Both are subject to the demands of the Due Process Clause. Specific jurisdiction, as its name suggests, allows a state court to adjudicate specific claims against a defendant. When a defendant "purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State," that State's courts may adjudicate claims that "arise out of or relate to the defendant's contacts' with the forum".

General jurisdiction, by contrast, allows a state court to adjudicate "any and all claims" brought against a defendant." This sweeping authority exists only when the defendant's connection to the State is tight—so tight, in fact, that the defendant is "at home" there. An individual is typically "at home" in her domicile, and a corporation is typically "at home" in both its place of incorporation and principal place of business. Absent an exceptional circumstance, general jurisdiction is cabined to these locations.

This case involves a Pennsylvania statute authorizing courts to exercise general jurisdiction over corporations that are not "at home" in the Commonwealth. All foreign corporations must register to do business in Pennsylvania, and all registrants are subject to suit on "any cause" in the Commonwealth's courts. Section 5301 thus purports to empower Pennsylvania courts to adjudicate any and all claims against corporations doing business there.

As the Pennsylvania Supreme Court recognized, this statute "clearly, palpably, and plainly violates the Constitution." Look no further than BNSF R. Co. v. Tyrrell, a case with remarkably similar facts—and one that the Court conspicuously ignores. There, we assessed whether Montana's courts could exercise general jurisdiction over the BNSF railroad. No plaintiff resided in Montana or suffered an injury there. Like Mallory, one of the plaintiffs alleged that the railroad exposed him to toxic substances that caused his cancer. Like Norfolk Southern, BNSF had tracks and employees in the forum, but it was neither incorporated nor headquartered there. We rejected Montana's assertion of general jurisdiction over BNSF because "in-state business does not suffice to permit the assertion of general jurisdiction over claims that are unrelated to any activity occurring in [the State]." Daimler and Goodyear, we explained, could not have made that any clearer.

The same rule applies here. The Pennsylvania statute announces that registering to do business in the Commonwealth "shall constitute a sufficient basis" for general jurisdiction. But as our precedent makes crystal clear, simply doing business is insufficient. Absent an exceptional circumstance, a corporation is subject to general jurisdiction only in a State where it is incorporated or has its principal place of business. Adding the antecedent step of registration does not change that conclusion. If it did, "every corporation would be subject to general jurisdiction in every state in which it registered, and Daimler's ruling would be robbed of meaning by a back-door thief."

The Court short-circuits this precedent by characterizing this case as one about consent rather than contacts-based jurisdiction. Consent is an established basis for personal jurisdiction, which is, after all, a waivable defense. “A variety of legal arrangements have been used to represent express or implied consent to the personal jurisdiction of the court,” contract, stipulation, and in-court appearance. Today, the Court adds corporate registration to the list.

This argument begins on shaky ground, because Pennsylvania itself does not treat registration as synonymous with consent. Section 5301(a)(2)(i) baldly asserts that “qualification to do business in this Commonwealth as a corporation” in the Commonwealth is a sufficient hook for general jurisdiction. The subsection (invoked by neither Mallory nor the Court) permits the exercise of general jurisdiction over a corporation based on “consent, to the extent authorized by law.” If registration were actual consent, one would expect to see some mention of jurisdiction in Norfolk Southern’s registration paperwork—which is instead wholly silent on the subject. What Mallory calls “consent” is what the Pennsylvania Supreme Court called “compelled consent” to general jurisdiction by legislative command.” Corporate registration triggers general jurisdiction, but that is not “consent” in a conventional sense of the word.

To pull § 5301(a)(2)(i) under the umbrella of consent, the Court, following Mallory, invents a theory of consent that is nothing like the common understanding of the term, setting the terms of a bargain: In exchange for access to the Pennsylvania market, corporations must allow the Commonwealth’s courts to adjudicate any and all claims against them, even if they (like Mallory’s) having nothing to do with Pennsylvania. Everyone is charged with notice of the law, so corporations are on notice of the deal. By registering, they agree to its terms.

While this is a clever theory, it falls apart on inspection. The Court grounds its theory in the corporation’s choice to register with knowledge (constructive or actual) of the jurisdictional consequences. But on that logic, any long-arm statute could be said to elicit consent. Consider a law that simply provides, “any corporation doing business in this State is subject to general jurisdiction in our courts.” Such a law defies our precedent, which, again, holds that “doing business” does not suffice to permit the assertion of general jurisdiction.” Yet this hypothetical law, like the Pennsylvania statute, gives notice that general jurisdiction is the price of doing business. And its “notice” is no less “clear” than Pennsylvania’s. So on the Court’s theory, corporations that choose to do business in the State impliedly consent to general jurisdiction. The result: A State could defeat the Due Process Clause by adopting a law at odds with the Due Process Clause.

That makes no sense. If the hypothetical statute overreaches, then Pennsylvania’s defense fails. The United States observes, “invoking the label ‘consent’ rather than ‘general jurisdiction’ does not render Pennsylvania’s long-arm statute constitutional.” Brief for United States, Curiae 4. Yet the Court takes this route without so much as acknowledging its circumspect nature.

While our due process precedent permits States to place reasonable conditions on foreign corporations in exchange for access to their markets, there is nothing reasonable about a State extracting consent in cases where it has “no connection whatsoever.” The Due Process Clause protects more than the rights of defendants—it also protects interstate federalism. We have emphasized this principle in case after case. For instance, in Hanson v. Denckla, we stressed that “restrictions” on personal jurisdiction “are more than a guarantee of immunity from inconvenient or distant litigation. They are a consequence of territorial limitations on the power of the respective States.” In World-Wide Volkswagen, we explained that “even if the defendant would suffer minimal or no inconvenience from being forced to litigate before the tribunals of another State the Due Process Clause, acting as an instrument of interstate federalism, may sometimes act to divest the State of its power to render a valid judgment.” And in Bristol-Myers, we reinforced that “this federalism interest may be decisive.” A defendant’s ability to waive its objection to personal jurisdiction reflects that the Clause protects, first and foremost, an individual right. But when a State announces a blanket rule that ignores the territorial boundaries on its power, federalism interests are implicated too.

Pennsylvania’s effort to assert general jurisdiction over every company doing business within its borders infringes on the sovereignty of its sister States in a way no less “exorbitant” and “grasping” than attempts we have previously rejected. Conditions on doing in-state business cannot be “inconsistent with those rules of public law which secure the jurisdiction and authority of each State from encroachment by all others.” Permitting Pennsylvania to impose a blanket claim of authority over controversies with no connection to the Commonwealth intrudes on the prerogatives of other States—domestic and foreign—to adjudicate the rights of their citizens and enforce their own laws.

The plurality’s response is to fall back, yet again, on “consent.” In its view, because a defendant can waive its personal jurisdiction right, a State can never overreach in demanding its relinquishment. That is not how we treat rights with structural components. The right to remove a case to federal court, for instance, is primarily personal—it secures for a nonresident defendant a federal forum thought to be more impartial. At the same time, however, it serves federal interests by ensuring that federal courts can vindicate federal rights. Recognizing this dual role, we have rejected efforts of States to require defendants to relinquish this (waivable) right to removal as a condition of doing business. The same logic applies here. Pennsylvania’s power grab infringes on more than just the rights of defendants—it upsets the proper role of the States in our federal system.

The plurality attempts to minimize the novelty of its conclusion by pointing to our decision in Burnham v. Superior Court of Cal. There, we considered whether “tag jurisdiction”—service upon a defendant physically present in the forum State—remains an effective method of securing general jurisdiction after International Shoe. We unanimously agreed that it does. The plurality claims that registration jurisdiction for a corporation is just as valid as the “tag jurisdiction” that we approved in Burnham. But in drawing this analogy, the plurality omits any reference to the reasoning in Burnham.

In Burnham, we acknowledged that tag jurisdiction would not satisfy the contact test for general jurisdiction. Nonetheless, we reasoned that tag jurisdiction is “both firmly established by tradition and still favored,” making it “one of the continuing traditions of our law that defines the due process standard of ‘traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.’” Burnham thus permits a longstanding and still-accepted basis for jurisdiction that passes International Shoe’s test.

General-jurisdiction-by-registration flunks both of these prongs: It is neither “firmly established by tradition” nor “still favored.” Thus, the plurality’s analogy to tag jurisdiction is at best.

Start with the second prong. In Burnham, “we did not know of a single state that had used in-state service as a basis of jurisdiction.” Here, as Mallory concedes, Pennsylvania is not the only State with a statute treating registration as sufficient for general jurisdiction. Indeed, many States have jettisoned the jurisdictional consequences of corporate registration altogether in uncertain terms. With the Pennsylvania Legislature standing alone, the plurality cannot attempt to describe this method of securing general jurisdiction as “still favored,” or as “our common understanding now”. Quite the opposite: The plurality denigrates “the traditional age”—reflected by the vast majority of States—and appeals to its own notions of fairness.

The past is as fatal to the plurality’s theory as the present. Burnham’s tradition of “tag jurisdiction” is rooted in the assumption that a method for securing jurisdiction was “shared by American courts at the same time”—“1868, when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted.” But the plurality can cite only one single case from that period supporting its theory. In fact, the evidence runs in the other direction. Statutes that required the appointment of a registered agent for service were far more modest than Pennsylvania’s. And even when a statute was written more broadly, state courts generally understood it to implicitly limit jurisdiction to suits with a connection to the forum. The state reporters are replete with examples of judicial decisions that reflect the then-prevailing rule: Compliance with a registration law did not subject a foreign corporation to general jurisdiction over it in every case, but only those related to the forum. Our cases from this period are in the same line. Although “plaintiffs typically did not sue defendants in forums that had no relation to causes of action,” courts repeatedly turned them away when they did.

Sidestepping Burnham’s logic, the plurality seizes on its bottom-line approval of tag jurisdiction. According to the plurality, tag jurisdiction (based on physical presence) and registration jurisdiction (based on deemed consent) are essentially the same thing—so by Burnham blessed the other. The plurality never explains why they are the same, even though they are not.

we have just discussed—more than a century’s worth of law treats them as distinct. The plurality’s rationale seems to be that if a person is subject to general jurisdiction anywhere she is present, then a corporation should be subject to general jurisdiction anywhere it does business. That is not only a non sequitur—it is “contrary to the historical rationale of International Shoe.”

Before International Shoe, a state court’s power over a person turned strictly on “service of process within the State” (presence) “or her voluntary appearance” (consent). Pennoyer v. Neff. In response to changes in interstate business and transportation in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, States deployed new legal fictions designed to secure the presence or consent of nonresident individuals and foreign corporations. For example, state laws required nonresident drivers to give their “implied consent” to be sued for their in-state accidents as a condition of using the road. And foreign corporations, as we have discussed, were required by statute to “consent” to the appointment of a resident agent, so that the company could then be constructively “present” for in-state service.

As Justice Scalia explained, such extensions of “consent and presence were purely fictional” and can no longer stand after International Shoe. The very point of International Shoe was to “cast aside” the legal fictions built on the old territorial approach to personal jurisdiction and replace them with its contacts-based test. In Burnham, we upheld tag jurisdiction because it is not one of those fictions—it is presence. By contrast, Pennsylvania’s registration statute is based on deemed consent. And this kind of legally implied consent is one of the very fictions that our decision in International Shoe swept away.

Neither JUSTICE ALITO nor the plurality seriously contests this history. Nor does either deny that Mallory’s theory would gut Daimler. Instead, they insist that we already decided this question in a pre-International Shoe precedent: Pennsylvania Fire.

The Court asserts that Pennsylvania Fire controls our decision today. I disagree. The case was “decided before this Court’s transformative decision on personal jurisdiction in International Shoe,” and we have already stated that “prior decisions that are inconsistent with this standard are overruled”. Pennsylvania Fire fits that bill. Time and again, we have reinforced that “doing business’ tests”—like those “framed before specific jurisdiction evolved in the United States”—are not a valid basis for general jurisdiction. The only innovation of Pennsylvania’s statute is to make “doing business” synonymous with “consent.” If Pennsylvania Fire endorses that trick, then Pennsylvania Fire is no longer good law.

The plurality tries to get around International Shoe by claiming that it did no more than expand jurisdiction, affecting nothing that came before it. That is as fictional as the old concept of “corporate presence” on which the plurality relies. We have previously abandoned even “ancient” bases of jurisdiction for incompatibility with International Shoe. And we have repeatedly reminded litigants not to put much stock in our pre-International Shoe decisions. Daimler itself reinforces that pre-International Shoe decisions “should not attract heavy reliance today.” Over and over, we have reminded litigants that International Shoe is “canonical,” “seminal,” “pathmarking,” and even “momentous”—to give just a few examples. Yet the Court acts as if none of this ever happened.

In any event, I doubt Pennsylvania Fire would control this case even if it remained. Pennsylvania Fire distinguished between express consent (that is, consent “actually made by the document”) and deemed consent (inferred from doing business). As Judge Laddie Brown, Jr. emphasized in a decision invoked by the plurality, without “express consent,” the same rules should apply.

The express power of attorney in Pennsylvania Fire “made service on the corporation’s agent in Pennsylvania equivalent to service on its registered agent in the state.” Norfolk Southern, by contrast, “executed no document like the power of attorney or the certificate of incorporation that made clear that it had accepted service in this state.” The Court makes much of what Norfolk Southern did write on its forms: It named a “Registered Office Provider,” it notified Pennsylvania of a merger, and it paid $700 in paperwork. None of those documents use the word “agent,” nothing hints at “jurisdiction,” and (as the Pennsylvania Supreme Court explained) nothing suggests that registration is “voluntary.” Consent in Pennsylvania Fire was contained in the documents that the Court deemed by statute. If “mere formalities” matter as much as the plurality says, then the same rules should respect this one too.

By now, it should be clear that the plurality’s primary approach to this case is to follow the personal jurisdiction precedent. Relying on a factsheet downloaded from the Internet, the plurality argues that Norfolk Southern is such a “part of ‘the D.C. Community,’” and does so much business there, that its “presence” in Pennsylvania should require it to stand for suits having nothing to do with the Commonwealth. In Daimler AG v. Bauman, we roundly rejected the plaintiff’s request that we “approve the exercise of general jurisdiction over a defendant in every State in which a corporation ‘engages in a substantial, continuous, and systematic pattern of business.’” The established test—which the plurality barely acknowledges—is that a corporation is “at home” in the State. “A corporation that operates in many places need not register in just as many, ‘can scarcely be deemed at home in all of them.’”

Critics of Daimler and Goodyear may be happy to see them go. And make no mistake: they are halfway out the door. If States take up the Court’s invitation to manipulate the test, Daimler and Goodyear will be obsolete, and, at least for corporations, specific jurisdiction will be “superfluous.” Because I would not work this sea change, I respectfully dissent.

1.5 Synthesis: Analyzing a Personal Jurisdiction Problem

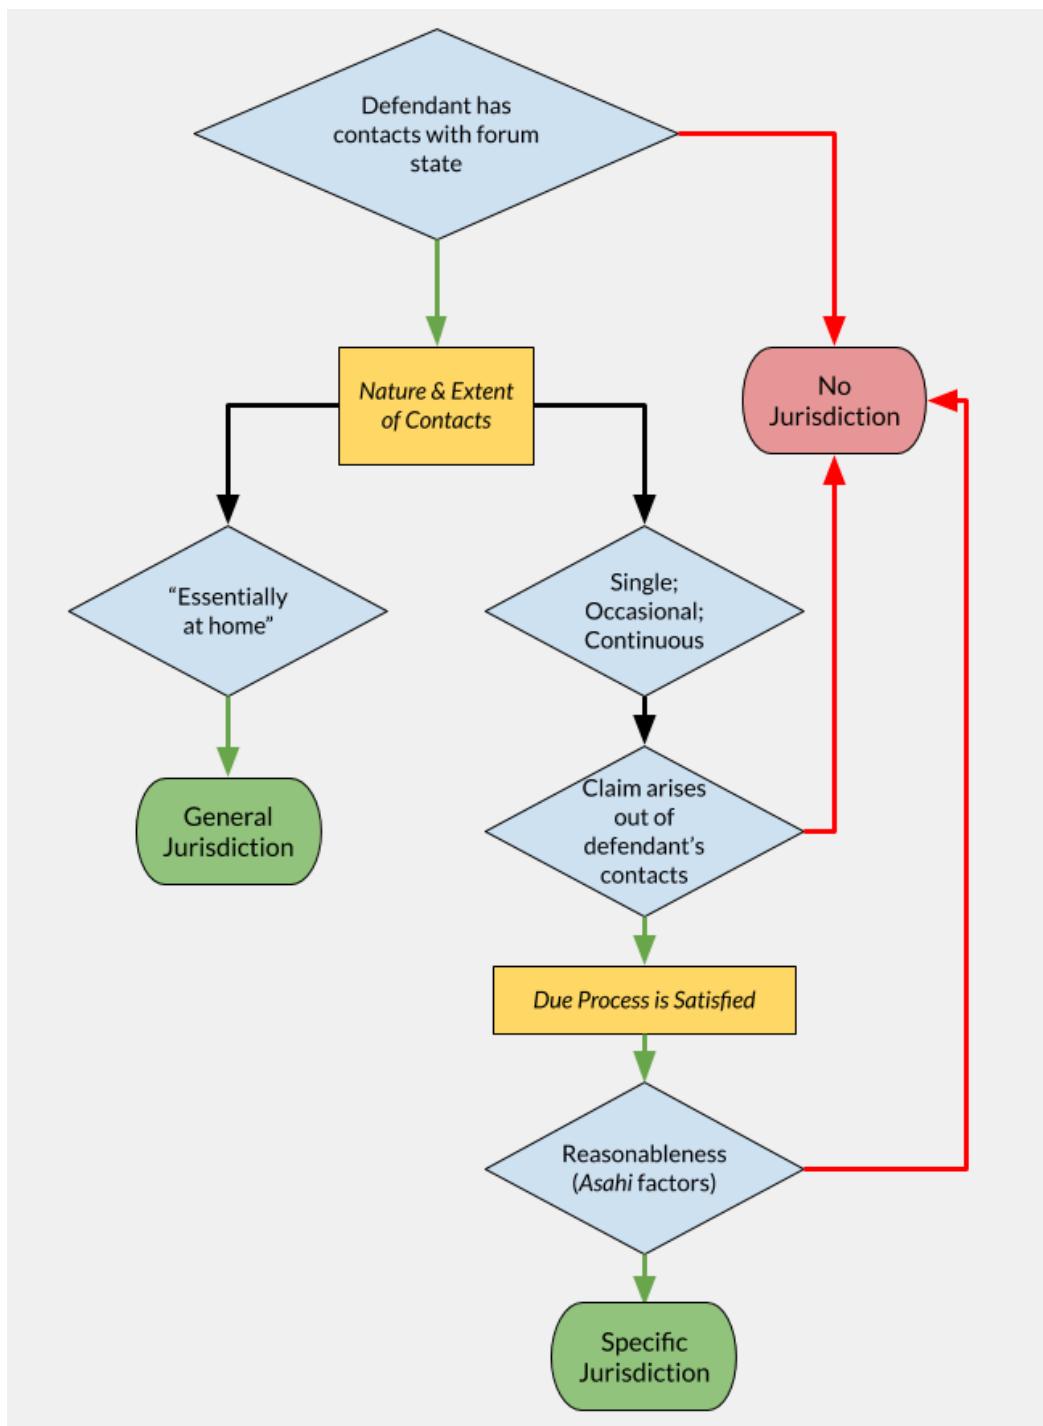

Fig. 4.4

2. Statutory Authorization: Long-Statutes

Within the outer bounds allowed under the constitutional due process standard, personal jurisdiction are subject to additional limits under state “long-arm” statute two types of long-arm statute.

Robert Wadlow, the tallest human in history, visiting Folsom Prison in 1939 as a spokesman for the International Shoe Company.

2.1 Enumerated Statutes

Enumerated long-arm statutes identify particular circumstances in which a state's courts may exercise jurisdiction over a non-resident. The New York long-arm statute is an example.

NY CPLR § 302

Personal jurisdiction by acts of non-domiciliaries.

(a) Acts which are the basis of jurisdiction. As to a cause of action arising from any of the acts enumerated in this section, a court may exercise personal jurisdiction over any non-domiciliary, or his executor or administrator, who in person or through an agent:

1. transacts any business within the state or contracts anywhere to supply goods or services in the state; or
2. commits a tortious act within the state, except as to a cause of action for defamation of character arising from the act; or
3. commits a tortious act without the state causing injury to person or property within the state, except as to a cause of action for defamation of character arising from the act, if he
 - (i) regularly does or solicits business, or engages in any other persistent course of conduct, or derives substantial revenue from goods used or consumed or services rendered, in the state, or
 - (ii) expects or should reasonably expect the act to have consequences in the state and derives substantial revenue from interstate or international commerce; or
4. owns, uses or possesses any real property situated within the state.

(b) Personal jurisdiction over non-resident defendant in matrimonial actions or family court proceedings. A court in any matrimonial action or family court proceeding involving a demand for support, alimony, maintenance, distributive awards or special relief in matrimonial actions may exercise personal jurisdiction over the respondent or defendant notwithstanding the fact that he or she no longer is a resident or domiciliary of this state, or over his or her executor or administrator, if the party seeking support is a resident of or domiciled in this state at the time such demand is made, provided that this state was the matrimonial domicile of the parties before their separation, or the defendant abandoned the plaintiff in this state, or the claim for support, alimony, maintenance, distributive awards or special relief in matrimonial actions accrued under the laws of this state or under an agreement executed in this state. The family court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a non-resident respondent to the extent provided in sections one hundred fifty-four and one thousand thirty-six and article five-B of the family court act and article five-A of the domestic relations law.

(c) Effect of appearance. Where personal jurisdiction is based solely upon this section, an appearance does not confer such jurisdiction with respect to causes of action not arising from an act enumerated in this section.

(d) Foreign defamation judgment. The courts of this state shall have personal jurisdiction over any person who obtains a judgment in a defamation proceeding outside the United States against any person who is a resident of New York or is a person or entity amenable to jurisdiction in New York who has assets in New York or may have to take actions in New York to comply with the judgment, for the purposes of rendering declaratory relief with respect to that person's liability for the judgment, and/or for the purpose of determining whether said judgment should be deemed non-recognizable pursuant to section fifty-three hundred four of this chapter, to the fullest extent permitted by the United States constitution, provided:

1. the publication at issue was published in New York, and
2. that resident or person amenable to jurisdiction in New York (i) has assets which might be used to satisfy the foreign defamation judgment, or (ii) may bring actions in New York to comply with the foreign defamation judgment. The provisions of this subdivision shall apply to persons who obtained judgments in defamation cases outside the United States prior to and/or after the effective date of this subdivision.

Under an enumerated long-arm statute, determining whether the court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant involves a two-step analysis:

1. Does the case fall within one (or more) of the circumstances enumerated in the statute?
2. If so, does the defendant have the requisite contacts with the forum state to satisfy the constitutional due process standard?

2.2 Constitutional Limit Statutes

This type of long-arm statute grants a state's courts jurisdiction to the full extent permitted under the state's constitution. The California long-arm statute is an example.

Cal. Code Civ. Proc § 410.10

Jurisdiction exercisable.

A court of this state may exercise jurisdiction on any basis not inconsistent with the Constitution of this state or of the United States.

Under this type of long-arm statute, the same analysis (i.e. does the defendant have minimum contacts with the forum state?) answers both the statutory and constitutional question.

Some enumerated long-arm statutes have been interpreted as authorizing the exercise of jurisdiction to the full extent permitted under the constitution. See, e.g., Dillon v. Numismatic Funding Corp., 291 N.C. 674, 234 S.E.2d 171 (1977). In interpreting the enactment of G.S. 1-75.4(1)(d), it is apparent that the General Assembly intended to make available to the North Carolina courts the full jurisdictional powers permissible under federal due process."

3. Review Questions

Question 1

Mrs. Potter, a wealthy resident of Philadelphia, decides that the time has come to make provisions for her children after her death. She creates a trust, administered by the Delaware Bank & Trust Company (located, naturally enough, in Delaware). Under the terms of the trust, after Mrs. Potter's death, her daughter Dora will receive whatever money remains in the trust account. She also writes a will, leaving the remainder of her estate to her other daughter, Polly.

A year later, Mrs. Potter decides to move to Cocoanut Manor, a luxurious retirement community in Florida. There she meets Mr. Hammer, the genial grifter who developed Cocoanut Manor in the hopes of attracting a steady supply of wealthy victims for his cons. Mrs. Potter, smitten by Hammer's charm and believing he is the true love of her life, contacts the Delaware bank and directs them to make Mr. Hammer the trust beneficiary in place of her daughter Dora, who hasn't even bothered to write or call since Mrs. Potter moved to Florida.

A few months later, Mrs. Potter dies in a tragic shuffleboard accident. Dora Potter is chagrined to discover that the trust funds, now totalling $1.4 million, will go to Mr. Hammer instead of her. She brings a lawsuit in a Florida court, challenging the validity of the trust. Polly Potter, who despises her sister, also joins the suit as a co-plaintiff, arguing that the money in the trust should also go to her as part of Mrs. Potter's estate under the will. Because the Bank is in control of the trust account, it is named as a co-defendant in the suit.

Does the Florida court have personal jurisdiction over the Bank?

Question 2

Dan & Pat, both residents of Pennsylvania, are partners in a Delaware business. The business fails, and a disagreement arises between Dan & Pat over the division of the partnership's remaining assets. Deciding to get away from it all, Dan moves to Idaho. Pat now wants to sue Dan over the partnership dispute. Each state's long-arm statute provides for jurisdiction to the full extent permitted under the U.S. Constitution.

In which state(s) may Pat sue?

Dan operates a gas station near U.S. Interstate 40 in Greensboro, north Carolina. The gas station is frequented by locals and by interstate travelers using I-40. last summer, Dan charmed a woman driving an automobile bearing Missitucky license plates. The car belonged to Vivian, who was driving through Greensboro on her way home from vacation in the Outer Banks. A few days later, as Vivian reached Missitucky, her car swerved out of control and hit an embankment, causing damage to Dan's gas station. Vivian filed a suit against Dan in Missitucky state court, alleging that the accident resulted in his negligence. Dan denied the charge, claiming that he was not negligent and that the accident was caused by a defect in the tire.

Assuming the Missitucky long-arm statute allows it, would the exercise of personal jurisdiction over Dan be permissible under the U.S. Constitution?

Question 4

If P sues D in a North Dakota court, claiming that D owes P $25,000 arising from their business partnership, may the North Dakota court assert jurisdiction?

- a. No, because the case does not arise out of any activity in North Dakota
- b. No, because P has no contacts with North Dakota
- c. Yes, because D is subject to general jurisdiction in North Dakota
- d. Yes, but only if D is personally served while present in North Dakota

Question 5

P has a vacation home on the Jersey shore. While P is spending the weekend there, D sues P in New Jersey to serve him with a complaint and summons in a suit D has filed in New Jersey claiming that P owes D $25,000 arising from their business partnership. May the New Jersey court assert jurisdiction?

- a. Yes, because P owns property in New Jersey
- b. Yes, because P is physically present in New Jersey when he is served
- c. No, because D's suit does not arise from, and is unrelated to, P's contacts with New Jersey
- d. No, because New Jersey is not P's permanent home

Chapter 4

Subject Matter Jurisdiction

1. Federal Question Jurisdiction

1.1 Constitutional & Statutory Basis

U.S. Constitution, art.III, § 2

The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority;

28 U.S.C. § 1331

The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.

1.2 Arising Under Federal Law

Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 1496 (1908)

Statement by Justice MOODY

The appellees (husband and wife), being residents and citizens of Kentucky, brought this suit in equity in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Kentucky against the appellant, a railroad company and a citizen of the same state. The object of the suit was to compel the specific performance of the following contract:

Louisville, Ky., Oct. 2d, 1871.

The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, in consideration that E. L. Mottley and wife, Annie E. Mottley, have this day released company from all damages or claims for damages for injuries received by them on the 7th of September, 1871, in consequence of a collision of trains on the railroad of said company at Randolph's Station, Jefferson County, Kentucky, hereby agrees to issue free passes on said railroad and branches now existing or to exist, to said E. L. & Annie E. Mottley for the remainder of the present year, and thereafter to renew said passes annually during the lives of said Mottley and wife or either of them.

The remedy that the Mottleys sought was "specific performance", i.e. an order requiring the Railroad to honor the free passes. This is a form of equitable relief, sometimes available instead of money damages, which is the usual legal relief for breach of contract. Prior to the advent of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, different procedures applied to suits for equitable relief and suits for legal relief. A suit in equity was commenced by filing a "bill", functionally equivalent to a complaint. You can read the Mottleys' bill here.

The Hepburn Act gave the Interstate Commerce Commission regulatory authority over railroad shipping and passenger rates. The Act also restricted the practice of giving rate rebates and free passes.

The bill alleged that in September, 1871, plaintiffs, while passengers upon the defendant's trains, were injured by the defendant's negligence, and released their respective claims for damages in consideration of the agreement for transportation during their lives, expressed in writing. It is alleged that the contract was performed by the defendant up to January 1, 1906, when the defendant declined to renew the passes. The bill then alleges that the refusal to continue the contract was based solely upon that part of the act of Congress of June 29, 1906, which forbids the giving of free passes or free transportation. The bill further alleges: First, that the act referred to does not prohibit the giving of passes under the circumstances; and, second, that, if the law is to be construed as prohibiting such passes, it is in conflict with the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution, because it deprives the plaintiffs of their property without due process of law. The defendant demurred to the bill. The judge of the circuit court, after hearing the demurrer, entered a decree for the relief prayed for, and the defendant appealed to this court.

Opinion

Two questions of law were brought here by appeal. They are, first, whether that part of the act of Congress of June 29, 1906, which forbids the giving of free passes or the collection of different compensation for transportation of passengers than that specified in the contract, makes it unlawful to perform a contract for transportation of persons, who in good faith, before the passage of the act, had accepted such contract in satisfaction of a valid claim against the railroad; and, second, whether the statute, if it should be construed to make a contract unlawful, is in violation of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. We do not deem it necessary, however, to consider either of these questions. In our opinion, the court below was without jurisdiction of the cause. Neither party has shown that jurisdiction, but it is the duty of this court to see to it that the jurisdiction of the Court, which is defined and limited by statute, is not exceeded. This duty we have performed of our own motion.

There was no diversity of citizenship and it is not and cannot be suggested that there was any other ground of jurisdiction, except that the case was a "suit arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States." It is the settled interpretation of these words, as used in the Constitution, in conferring jurisdiction, that a suit arises under the Constitution and laws of the United States, only when the plaintiff's statement of his own cause of action shows that it is based upon the Constitution or the laws of the United States. It is not enough that the plaintiff alleges some anticipated defense to his cause of action and asserts that the defense is invalidated by some provision of the Constitution of the United States. Although such allegations show that very likely, during the course of the litigation, a question under the Constitution would arise, they do not show that the cause of action, that is, the plaintiff's original cause of action, arises under the Constitution. In Tenn. & Planters' Bank, 152 U.S. 454, the plaintiff, the State of Tennessee, brought suit in the Supreme Court of the United States to recover from the defendant certain taxes alleged to be unconstitutional under the laws of the State. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant claimed an immunity from taxation by virtue of its charter, and that therefore the tax was void, because in violation of the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which forbids any State from passing a law in conflict with the Constitution.

the obligation of contracts. The cause was held to be beyond the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court, the court saying, by Mr. Justice Gray, "a suggestion of one party, that the other will or may set up a claim under the Constitution or laws of the United States, does not make the suit one arising under that Constitution or those laws."

The application of this rule to the case at bar is decisive against the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court.

Note on Mottley

On remand, the Kentucky court held that the 1906 statute did not apply to the Mottleys' free passes and ordered the railroad to continue honoring the settlement agreement. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Mottley, 133 Ky. 652 (1909). The case made its way back to the U.S. Supreme Court, which once again ruled against the Mottleys. Holding that the 1906 statute rendered the agreement to provide free passes illegal, the Court reversed the order granting specific performance. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 US 467 (1911). That opinion did not entirely foreclose the possibility of some other remedy for the Mottleys:

Whether, without enforcing the contract in suit, the defendants in error may, by some form of proceeding against the railroad company, recover or restore the rights they had when the railroad collision occurred is a question not before us, and we express no opinion on it.

However, there is no record of anything further transpiring in the case.

1.3 Federal Element in a State Law Claim

Grable & Sons Metal Products, Inc. v. Darue Engineering & Manufacturing, 545 U.S. 308 (2005)

Justice SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question is whether want of a federal cause of action to try claims of title to land obtained at a federal tax sale precludes removal to federal court of a state action with nondiverse parties raising a disputed issue of federal title law. We answer no, and hold that the national interest in providing a federal forum for federal tax litigation is sufficiently substantial to support the exercise of federal-question jurisdiction over the disputed issue on removal, which would not distort any division of labor between the state and federal courts, provided or assumed by Congress.

In 1994, the Internal Revenue Service seized Michigan real property belonging to Grable & Sons Metal Products, Inc., to satisfy Grable's federal tax delinquency. The notice statute, § 6335 required the IRS to give notice of the seizure, and there is no dispute that Grable did not receive actual notice by certified mail before the IRS sold the property to respondent Darue & Manufacturing. Although Grable also received notice of the sale itself, it did not have the statutory right to redeem the property within 180 days of the sale, and after that period had passed, the Government gave Darue a quitclaim deed.

Five years later, Grable brought a quiet title action in state court, claiming that Darue's quiet title was invalid because the IRS had failed to notify Grable of its seizure of the property in the exact manner required by § 6335(a), which provides that written notice must be given to the Secretary to the owner of the property or left at his usual place of abode or business. The court held that the statute required personal service, not service by certified mail.

Darue removed the case to Federal District Court as presenting a federal question. The court held that the claim of title depended on the interpretation of the notice statute in the federal question context. The District Court declined to remand the case at Grable's behest after finding that the question presented "pose a 'significant question of federal law,'" and ruling that Grable's lack of a federal cause of action to enforce its claim against Darue did not bar the exercise of federal jurisdiction. After considering the merits, the court granted summary judgment to Darue, holding that although § 6335(a) required personal service, substantial compliance with the statute was enough.

The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed. On the jurisdictional question, the court thought it sufficed that the title claim raised an issue of federal law that had to be resolved in order to decide the case. The court held that the notice statute implicated a substantial federal interest (in construing federal tax law). The court rejected Grable's argument that the court should not exercise jurisdiction over the case because it did not present a "substantial federal question." The court affirmed the District Court's judgment on the merits. We granted certiorari on the jurisdictional question alone, to resolve a split within the Courts of Appeals on whether the federal-question jurisdiction in Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U. S. 804 (1986), always requires a federal cause of action as a condition for exercising federal-question jurisdiction. We now affirm.

II

Darue was entitled to remove the quiet title action if Grable could have brought it directly to the federal district court originally, 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a), as a civil action "arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States," § 1331. This provision for federal-question jurisdiction is the most common, but not the only, type of federal jurisdiction. It is also exercised by and large by plaintiffs pleading a cause of action created by federal law. There is also another longstanding, if less frequently encountered, variety of federal "arising under" jurisdiction, this Court having recognized for nearly 100 years that in certain circumstances, federal-question jurisdiction will lie over state-law claims that implicate significant federal interests. The "arising under" doctrine captures the commonsense notion that a federal court ought to be able to resolve disputes that are substantially federal in character, even if they are not recognized under state law that nonetheless turn on substantial questions of federal law. The doctrine thus justifies resort to the experience, solicitude, and hope of uniformity that a federal court offers on federal issues.

A quitclaim deed is "a document by which a grantor conveys his or her present interest, if any, in a given parcel of real property to a grantees without representing, covenanting, or warranting that the title is good." Wex Legal Dictionary.

"A quiet title action is a special legal proceeding to determine ownership of real property. A party with a claim of ownership to land can file an action to quiet title, which serves as a sort of lawsuit against anyone and everyone else who has a claim to the land. If the owner prevails in the quiet title action, no further challenges to the title can be brought." Wex Legal Dictionary.

The classic example is Smith v. Kansas City Title & Trust Co., 255 U.S. 180 (1921), a suit by a shareholder claiming that the defendant corporation could not lawfully buy certain bonds of the National Government because their issuance was unconstitutional. Although Missouri law provided the cause of action, the Court recognized federal-question jurisdiction because the principal issue in the case was the federal constitutionality of the bond issue. Smith thus held, in a somewhat generous statement of the scope of the doctrine, that a state-law claim could give rise to federal-question jurisdiction so long as it “appears from the complaint that the right to relief depends upon the construction or application of [federal law].”

Recall that, in Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Mottley, the Court held that there was no federal question jurisdiction even though the principal issue at case was the legality of the Mottleys’ free passes under the 1906 federal statute. How is Mottley distinguishable from Smith v. Kansas City Title & Trust?

The Smith statement has been subject to some trimming to fit earlier and later cases recognizing the vitality of the basic doctrine, but shying away from the expansive view that mere need to apply federal law in a state-law claim will suffice to open the “arising under” door. It has in fact become a constant refrain in such cases that federal jurisdiction demands not only a contested federal issue, but a substantial one, indicating a serious federal interest in claiming the advantages thought to be inherent in a federal forum.

But even when the state action discloses a contested and substantial federal question, the exercise of federal jurisdiction is subject to a possible veto. For the federal issue will ultimately qualify for a federal forum only if federal jurisdiction is consistent with congressional judgment about the sound division of labor between state and federal courts governing the application of § 1331. Because arising-under jurisdiction to hear a state-law claim always raises the possibility of upsetting the state-federal line drawn (or at least assumed) by Congress, the presence of a disputed federal issue and the ostensible importance of a federal forum are never necessarily dispositive; there must always be an assessment of any disruptive portent in exercising federal jurisdiction.

These considerations have kept us from stating a “single, precise, all-embracing” test for jurisdiction over federal issues embedded in state-law claims between nondiverse parties. We have not kept them out simply because they appeared in state raiment, but neither have we treated “federal issue” as a password opening federal courts to any state action embracing a point of federal law. Instead, the question is, does a state-law claim necessarily raise a stated federal issue, actually disputed and substantial, which a federal forum may entertain without disturbing any congressionally approved balance of federal and state judicial responsibilities.

This case warrants federal jurisdiction. Grable’s state complaint must specify “the facts establishing the superiority of its claim,” and Grable has premised its superior title claim on a failure by the IRS to give it adequate notice, as defined by federal law. Whether Grable was given notice within the meaning of the federal statute is thus an essential element of its quiet title claim, and the meaning of the federal statute is actually in dispute; it appears to be the only legal or factual issue contested in the case. The meaning of the federal tax provision is an important issue of federal law that sensibly belongs in a federal court. The Government has a strong interest in the “prompt and certain collection of delinquent taxes,” and the ability of the IRS to satisfy its claims from the property of delinquents requires clear terms to allow buyers like Darue to satisfy themselves that the Service has touched the basis for good title. The Government thus has a direct interest in the availability of a federal cause of action to vindicate its own administrative action, and buyers (as well as tax delinquents) will find it valuable to come before judges used to federal tax matters. Finally, because this is a rare state title case that raises a contested matter of federal law, federal jurisdiction over a genuine disagreement over federal tax title provisions will portend only a microscopic change in the federal-state division of labor.

Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U. S. 804 (1986), on which Grable's position, is not to the contrary. Merrell Dow considered a state tort claim resting in part on an allegation that the defendant drug company had violated a federal misbranding provision. The defendant argued that it was thus presumptively negligent under Ohio law. The Court assumed that federal standards would have to be applied to resolve the claim, but after closely examining the strength of the plaintiff's interest at stake and the implications of opening the federal forum, held federal jurisdiction unavailable. Congress had not provided a private federal cause of action for violations of the federal misbranding requirement, and the Court found "it would flout, or at least ignore, congressional intent to conclude that federal courts might nevertheless exercise federal-question jurisdiction and provide remedies for violations of that federal statute simply because the violation is said to be a 'proximate cause' under state law."

Because federal law provides for no quiet title action that could be brought against the IRS, Grable argues that there can be no federal jurisdiction here, stressing some broad language in Merrell Dow that on its face supports Grable's position. But an opinion is to be read as a whole, and Merrell Dow cannot be read whole as overturning decades of precedent, as it would do if it were effectively adopting the Holmes dissent in Smith, and converting a federal cause of action into a sufficient condition for federal-question jurisdiction into a necessary one.

Accordingly, Merrell Dow should be read in its entirety as treating the absence of a federal cause of action as evidence relevant to, but not dispositive of, the "sensitive judicial inquiry into congressional intent" that § 1331 requires. The absence of any federal cause of action does not mean that Merrell Dow's result two ways. The Court saw the fact as worth some consideration, but not as dispositive, of the assessment of substantiality. But its primary importance emerged when the Court saw that the combination of no federal cause of action and no preemption of state remedies for misbranding as an important clue to Congress's conception of the scope of jurisdiction to be exercised under § 1331. The Court saw the missing cause of action not as a missing federal door mat, required, but as a missing welcome mat, required in the circumstances, when exercising federal jurisdiction over a state misbranding action would have attracted a horde of other state and removal cases raising other state claims with embedded federal issues. For example, a labeling standard without a federal cause of action could get a state claim into federal court, just as could any other federal standard without a federal cause of action. And that would bring a tremendous number of cases.

As already indicated, however, a comparable analysis yields a different jurisdictional conclusion in this case. Although Congress also indicated ambivalence in this case by providing no private right of action to Grable, it is the rare state quiet title action that involves contested issues of federal law. Consequently, jurisdiction over actions like Grable's would not materially affect, or threaten to affect, the normal currents of litigation. Given the absence of threatening structural consequences and the clear interest the Government, its buyers, and its delinquents have in the availability of a federal forum, there is no good reason to shirk from federal jurisdiction over the dispositive and contested federal issue at the heart of the state-law title claim.

Note: Understanding Grable

In Grable, the Supreme Court sought to clarify when a state-law claim with an “essential federal element” falls within the jurisdiction granted under §1331. This is not really an exception to the “well-pleaded complaint” rule in Mottley. Under the Grable standard, the federal question must still arise on the face of the complaint, i.e. as one of the elements of the plaintiff’s claim, not a defense.

But the Grable standard is an exception to the Holmes “creation test”. Even though state law creates the plaintiff’s cause of action (which, for Holmes, would mean the claim did not “arise under” federal law), the presence of a federal issue as an element of the claim may nonetheless confer federal jurisdiction under §1331.

Rule

A state-law claim raises a federal question, sufficient to confer jurisdiction under §1331, where,

1. An issue of federal law forms an essential part of plaintiff’s claim (not a defense),
2. The federal issue is actually disputed, and
3. There is a substantial federal interest at stake.

Essential Federal Issue

The federal issue is “essential” where the plaintiff’s “right to relief depends upon the construction or application of the Constitution or laws of the United States.” Smith v. Kansas City Title & Trust Co. (US 1921). This requirement will generally be satisfied where the plaintiff relies on federal law to establish a right, interest, or duty at issue in the case.

Federal Issue Is Actually Disputed

If there is no dispute between the parties over the federal issue as it arises in the case, there is no need for the court to resolve the issue and thus no reason to confer federal subject matter jurisdiction based on that issue.

Substantial Federal Interest

In assessing whether there is a “substantial federal interest”, the Supreme Court has considered these factors:

1. Whether uniform interpretation and application of federal law is important for fulfilling federal policy
2. Whether allowing a federal forum for private litigants would undermine a federal statutory enforcement scheme

3. Whether providing a federal forum would upset the balance between the state and federal judiciary.

Illustrations

Federal Issue

Essential: Grable

- Grable brought a state-law “quiet title” claim against Darue, which purchased property that had been seized from Grable in satisfaction of a tax delinquency.
 - Under state law, Grable was required to specify “the facts establishing the superiority of the property to the property.”
- Under the federal statute governing the sale of property to satisfy tax delinquencies, the IRS was supposed to give Grable written notice of the seizure. The IRS sent Grable notice of the seizure by certified mail, but Grable contended that the statute required personal service of the notice.
 - Grable argued that failure to satisfy the federal statutory notice requirement rendered the property invalid.
 - Darue argued that, since Grable received actual notice of the seizure and sale, but failed to exercise its statutory right to redeem the property within 180 days of the sale, Darue’s purchase of the property was valid.
- Grable’s right to relief thus depended on the construction and applicability of federal law. (Whether personal service of the IRS notice by certified mail satisfied the federal statute (the lack of notice specified by federal law rendered the sale of the property void). And this issue was actually at issue between the parties.
- The real focus of the suit was Grable’s right under federal law not to have its property seized without proper notice. Grable was merely using a state-law quiet title action as the means to assert that right (because federal law itself didn’t provide a remedy).

Not Essential: Merrell Dow

- The plaintiffs brought state law negligence and other tort claims against Merrell Dow for the birth defects allegedly resulting from a drug manufactured and marketed by Merrell Dow.
 - The plaintiffs alleged that Merrell Dow’s failure to warn about potential birth defects was negligent.
- Under state tort law, one way a plaintiff could satisfy the negligence element was by showing that the defendant failed to comply with an applicable state or federal legal standard.
 - The plaintiffs relied on federal law for this purpose, asserting that FDA regulations required Merrell Dow to include a warning about potential birth defects.
- The plaintiffs were not asserting rights under federal law. They were simply using the FDA regulations as evidence of what a reasonable drug manufacturer would do, to establish negligence under state law.

Not Essential: Gunn v. Minton

- Minton sued Gunn under state law for attorney malpractice. The malpractice claim was based on a previous suit in which Gunn had represented Minton as the plaintiff in a patent infringement case.

(governed by federal law).

- Under state law, Minton was required to allege (and prove) that Gunn's representation in the underlying suit was negligent, and that Gunn would have prevailed in that suit but for Gunn's negligence.
 - Minton alleged that Gunn failed to raise a certain argument in the patent infringement suit, that a competent lawyer would have raised the argument, and that Minton would have won if Gunn had raised the argument.
 - To decide whether the argument would have been successful, the court would have to apply federal patent law.
- As in Merrell Dow, the suit wasn't really about Minton's rights under federal law.
 - The patent law issue arose only as a benchmark for establishing whether Gunn suffered an injury as a result of negligent legal representation.

Federal Interest

Substantial: Grable

- There is a strong federal interest in uniform interpretation of the statutory requirements for seizures of taxpayer property by the IRS. Inconsistent interpretations by various state courts would subject the IRS to conflicting standards in carrying out its tax enforcement responsibilities, and promote uncertainty about the rights and interests of taxpayers and purchasers of seized property.
- The absence of a private right of action to enforce the statutory notice requirements in IRS tax seizures does not weigh against the exercise of federal jurisdiction over state-law quiet title claims based on alleged violations of the federal statutory requirements.
 - The federal statute provides no special enforcement mechanism for those requirements, so private suits aren't interfering with anything.
 - But the federal statute gives individual taxpayers private rights, so it makes sense for federal courts to adjudicate claims that depend on whether those rights were violated.
- Only rarely will a state-law quiet title claim depend on an issue of federal law, so there is little risk of opening the floodgates to claims that properly belong in state court.
- The strong federal interest at stake justifies opening the federal courts to the relatively limited set of cases in which the issue arises.

Not Substantial: Merrell Dow

- While there is a federal interest in uniform interpretation of drug labeling requirements under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (FDCA), that interest would not be impaired by conflicting state court interpretations in the context of state-law product liability claims.
 - Decisions in those cases would not affect any rights, interests, or duties under the FDCA itself.
- The FDCA has its own mechanism for promoting uniform interpretation and application, through exclusive enforcement by the FDA.
 - A state court determination in the negligence suit would not be binding in an enforcement action by the FDA.
- The FDCA provides for exclusive enforcement by the FDA, and there is no private right of action under the statute.

- The statutory enforcement scheme evidences a Congressional intent that the federal courts adjudicate private suits arising under the FDCA.
- Allowing plaintiffs to litigate FDCA non-compliance under the guise of state-law tort claims would undermine this statutory scheme.
- The plaintiffs in these cases asserted routine state-law claims, in which the federal issues are incidental to establishing the defendants' liability under state law.
 - State law commonly allows plaintiffs to use federal legal standards as a baseline for determining the appropriate standard of care under state tort law.
 - If every such case were regarded as arising under federal law for purposes of jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §1331, this would effectively "federalize" much routine tort law, subjecting the federal courts to a flood of cases that raise no substantial federal interest, and interfering with the role of state courts as the primary forum for raising state-law claims.

Not Substantial: Gunn v. Minton

- While there is a federal interest in uniform interpretation of federal patent law, that interest would not be impaired by conflicting state court interpretations in the context of state-law attorney malpractice claims.
 - State court interpretations of federal patent law in the context of attorney malpractice claims do not actually affect any rights or interests under federal patent law.
 - The federal issues arise only as counterfactual hypotheticals: what would have happened if the attorney had done something different?
- Uniform interpretation and application of federal patent law, in cases where rights under federal patent law are actually at stake, is ensured by exclusive federal jurisdiction over patent claims (i.e. state courts do not hear those claims at all).
 - Parties asserting rights under federal patent law have a private right of action in federal court.
- Malpractice claims based on an attorney's conduct in a federal patent suit don't really affect any rights or interests governed by federal patent law.
 - Minton's patent remains invalid, regardless of what happens in the malpractice case.
 - Allowing state courts to decide malpractice claims arising from patent suits won't interfere with the exclusive federal jurisdiction over patent claims themselves.

2. Diversity Jurisdiction

- (1) citizens of different States;
- (2) citizens of a State and citizens or subjects of a foreign state, except that the district courts shall not have original jurisdiction under this subsection of an action between citizens of a State and citizens or subjects of a foreign state who are lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States and are domiciled in the same State;
- (3) citizens of different States and in which citizens or subjects of a foreign state are additional parties; and
- (4) a foreign state, defined in section 1603(a) of this title, as plaintiff and citizens of a State or of different States.

(c) For the purposes of this section and section 1441 of this title—

2.2 State of Citizenship

Hanks v. Coan, No. 1:99CV00119 (M.D.N.C. Aug. 1999)

OSTEEN, J.

This matter comes before the court on Defendant Frances Coan's motion to dismiss complaint and Defendant John Coan, III's, motion to dismiss, pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1), for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. For the reasons discussed herein, the court grants Defendants' motions to dismiss.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Plaintiff filed this action asserting claims arising out of the same transactions and events that are the subject matter of the companion case, Coan v. Hanks. Defendant Frances Coan (F. Coan) and Defendant John Coan, III, (J. Coan) independently filed motions to dismiss complaint, pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1), on the ground that complete diversity of citizenship does not exist. On April 26, 1999, the court held a hearing solely on the diversity jurisdiction issue. The two motions to dismiss are the matters now pending before the court.

II. DISCUSSION

A. Citizens of Different States

It has long been held that federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction and can only hear actions over which they possess subject matter jurisdiction. The parties agree that the basis for jurisdiction in this federal court is diversity of citizenship pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1333. The parties dispute, however, whether there is complete diversity among the parties. Complete subject matter jurisdiction exists in this forum.

Plaintiff asserts that since she is a citizen of Utah and Defendants are citizens of North Carolina, complete diversity exists among the parties. Defendants contend that both Plaintiff and Defendants are citizens of North Carolina. Giving due regard to the fact that the plaintiff's citizenship "will not be presumed," the court turns to the law with regard to diversity jurisdiction.

For purposes of establishing diversity jurisdiction, "a natural person's citizenship is determined by domicile. Although a person may have more than one residence, she may have only one domicile at any one time."

Moreover, the court recognizes that “an individual acquires a ‘domicile of origin’ at birth, which continues until a new one is acquired.” There is a presumption that a person “retains the domicile with which he was born unless it can be shown that he has established a new domicile.”

When a person’s domicile is in dispute, the court must consider the following two factors in determining a person’s domicile: “(1) the party’s physical presence in the state; (2) the intent to remain in that state indefinitely.” In addition, it is the party asserting federal court jurisdiction, which in this case is the plaintiff, who shoulders the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that diversity exists.

It is well settled that the court has broad discretion to determine the manner in which the jurisdictional issue may be decided. Therefore, in ruling on the jurisdictional issue, the court may base its decision on the pleadings and affidavits, or the court may conduct an evidentiary hearing.

Having reviewed the briefs, and the testimony, and arguments made at the evidentiary hearing, the court finds that Plaintiff’s domicile remains her domicile of origin, which is North Carolina. At the time the lawsuit was filed, Plaintiff was physically present in the state of North Carolina and had been since May 1997. During this time, Plaintiff had no physical presence in Utah and has not returned to Utah since she left in 1997. Plaintiff maintains that ownership of a mobile home located in Utah indicates both a physical presence in Utah and an intent to return there. The court, however, finds this argument unpersuasive. Under certain circumstances, a mobile home qualifies as real property. In the present action, the mobile home is vacant and is merely being stored in Utah. Absent occupancy and use as a residence, the mobile home constitutes personal property. Mere presence of personal property in a state does not establish either physical presence in a state or an intent to remain indefinitely.

In addition, the fact that Plaintiff has applied for and has been admitted to a doctoral program at LaSalle University in no way suggests an intent to be domiciled in Utah. In the first place, Plaintiff admits that she has never been to LaSalle University. Moreover, all of the courses with LaSalle are completed via correspondence.

Furthermore, the case law makes it clear that in determining domicile for purposes of establishing diversity jurisdiction, courts are to look at the totality of the circumstances. In addition, courts generally consider the following list of factors to be relevant and instructive in ruling on this jurisdictional issue and ascertaining a party’s intent to remain in that state indefinitely:

current residence, voting registration and voting practices, location of personal and real property; location of brokerage and bank accounts; memberships in unions, fraternal organizations, churches, clubs, and other associations; place of employment or business; driver’s license and automobile registration; payment of taxes, as well as several others.

Courts faced with the identical jurisdictional issue have also considered “the location of a person’s physician, lawyer, accountant, dentist, stockbroker, etc.” While the court recognizes that a person’s own statement of intent with respect to acquiring or retaining a domicile may be relevant, it “is not conclusive and is to be accepted with considerable reserve.”

In the instant action, Plaintiff was born and reared in North Carolina. Plaintiff attended Duke University, Wake Forest University and the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. For the past [redacted] years Plaintiff has resided at 135 East Devonshire Street, Winston-Salem, North Carolina. Plaintiff claims that she owns the contents of the East Devonshire Street residence and Plaintiff has filed suit in the court for injunctive relief permitting her to continue to reside there. The court's findings in these actions standing alone indicate that Plaintiff's residence is located in North Carolina and that Plaintiff intends to remain in North Carolina.

Other factors clearly demonstrate that Plaintiff is a citizen of North Carolina. It is undisputed that Plaintiff owns an interest in several pieces of real property in North Carolina and Plaintiff manages rental properties in North Carolina. In fact, Plaintiff contends that her ownership of these rental properties "has caused her to forsake all other business activities." Plaintiff also holds personal bank accounts in North Carolina. In addition, Plaintiff's physician practices in North Carolina. [8] Although Plaintiff has left North Carolina for periods of time, [9] she has returned to Winston-Salem. Moreover, it is well settled that "domicile is not destroyed by absence from the domicile state."

The court also finds the case of Webb v. Nolan, 361 F.Supp. 418 (M.D.N.C.1972), aff'd, 500 F.2d 1253 (4th Cir.1973) to be analogous to the present case. While the court recognizes that it is not binding precedent, the court nevertheless affords the Webb decision substantial weight. In Webb, the court held that the plaintiff was a citizen of North Carolina and not California for purposes of determining if diversity of citizenship existed between the parties. The court made the following findings of fact:

Plaintiff has regularly returned to North Carolina during the vacations and holiday periods. Plaintiff has taught at a college in California. For years she considered a Winston-Salem physician her family doctor. The plaintiff admits that she was not employed in California on the date the suit was instituted and that she owns personal property in California and it is in storage there.

The court also found that "the fact that she was registered to vote in California does not affect her status as a citizen of North Carolina. Plaintiff has not exercised her franchise there since returning to North Carolina in July 1972. Plaintiff's failure to register to vote [in North Carolina] is immaterial under the circumstances."

Applying the facts of the present case to the controlling principles of law, the court finds that Plaintiff was domiciled in North Carolina both at the time the lawsuit was instituted and at the time Defendant removed the case to this court.

Therefore, absent complete diversity of citizenship between Plaintiff and Defendants, the court is without jurisdiction and must dismiss the case.

Citizenship of Organizational Parties

Under the diversity jurisdiction statute, a corporation is a citizen of both the state or country in which it is incorporated and the state or country where it has its principal place of business. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1). In Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 US 77 (2010), the Supreme Court held that a corporation's "principal place of business" is "the place where the corporation's high level officers direct, control, and coordinate the corporation's activities." Under this "nerve center" test, the principal place of business "will typically be found at a corporation's headquarters."

For unincorporated associations (e.g. a business partnership, labor union, or other organization formed for some common purpose), the traditional rule is that "an unincorporated association's citizenship is that of each of its members." United Steelworkers of America v. R.H. Bouligny, Inc. 382 U.S. 145 (1965); Carden v. Arkoma Associates, 494 U.S. 185 (1990). But in cases under the "Class Action Fairness Act", an unincorporated association is treated like a corporation, as a citizen of both the state under whose law it is organized and the state of its principal place of business. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(10).

2.3 Amount in Controversy

Ottawa Township Board of Trustees v. New Par, No. 3:17CV228 (N.D. Ohio July 10, 2017)

CARR, Senior District Judge

This state-law declaratory-judgment action tests whether the construction of a new cell tower must comply with an Ohio township's zoning regulations.

Ohio law generally forbids townships to regulate cellular communications towers and other public utilities within their jurisdictions. But a township's board of trustees may regulate the location and construction of a cell tower if: 1) either a trustee or a person who owns property neighboring the cell-tower site objects; and 2) the township notifies the person building the tower that it will subject the tower to its zoning regulations.

In 2015, defendant STC Towers, LLC, notified the Board of Trustees of Ottawa Township, Ohio, of its intent to construct a cell tower in one of the Township's residential districts. (Upon completion of construction, STC will lease the tower to defendant New Par, d/b/a Verizon Wireless.).

The Trustees objected to the proposed construction and so notified STC in writing, but STC proceeded with construction.

STC took the position that the Trustees' written objection was invalid under [Ohio law]. That provision requires that "the fiscal officer of the township send the person proposing to construct the tower written notice that the tower is subject to" the Township's zoning code. Because the Trustees themselves—rather than the Township's fiscal officer—had issued the notice, STC asserted that the Trustees had no power to regulate the placement or construction of the tower.

In January, 2017, the Trustees sued New Par in the Putnam County, Ohio, Court of Common Pleas. Their complaint sought an order requiring that New Par “comply with the Ottawa Zoning Resolution” and precluding defendants “from continuing the construction of the cell tower.

Rather than answer the complaint or file a responsive pleading, New Par removed the case to federal court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction.

After I granted New Par’s motion to join STC as a necessary party, the defendants counterclaimed against the Trustees. They alleged that the Trustees’ attempt to regulate the construction of the cell tower: 1) is ultra vires as a matter of Ohio law; 2) violates the Telecommunications Act of 1996; and 3) tortiously interferes with their business. New Par and STC seek money damages and a declaratory judgment that the Trustees have no power under Ohio law to regulate telecommunications facilities.

Pending is the Trustees’ motion to remand the case to state court.

They contend that the case does not satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement because their complaint seeks no monetary damages, only declaratory relief. The Trustees also contend that I may not consider the damages that defendants seek by way of counterclaim (which exceed $250,000) when determining the amount in controversy.

For the reasons that follow, I agree that the defendants’ counterclaim damages do not count toward the amount-in-controversy requirement. But the record is currently incomplete, so I cannot determine whether the value of the declaratory relief that the Trustees seek exceeds $250,000. Accordingly, I will hold the remainder of the motion in abeyance pending further developments from the parties.

Discussion

“Any civil action brought in a State court of which the district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction, may be removed by the defendant or the defendants, to the district courts of the United States for the district and division embracing the place where such action is pending.” 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a).

District courts have original jurisdiction over civil cases between citizens of different states where the amount in controversy, exclusive of costs and interest, exceeds $75,000. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1).

In cases that a defendant has removed from state court, “the existence of subject-matter jurisdiction is determined by examining the complaint as it existed at the time of removal.” The burden of showing that the district court has original jurisdiction is on the party seeking removal.

A. Defendants’ Counterclaim Damages

Neither the United States Supreme Court nor the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit has decided whether a defendant’s counterclaim damages count toward the amount-in-controversy requirement.

As some district courts have noted, however, the Sixth Circuit has “referred approvingly to the traditional rule that ‘no part of the required jurisdictional amount can be met by considering a defendant’s counterclaim to satisfy the amount in controversy requirement for removal jurisdiction purposes.’”

Ultimately, the Circuit decided the Sanford case on the ground that the plaintiffs admitted that the amount in controversy exceeded $75,000, so its endorsement in dicta of the “traditional rule” is just one piece of persuasive authority to weigh, rather than binding authority to follow.

At the district-court level, “the majority of Sixth Circuit district courts to confront the question have held that counterclaims should not be considered when determining the amount in controversy for purposes of removal jurisdiction.”

These cases make three points that persuade me that I ought not consider the defendants’ counterclaim damages in deciding the amount in controversy.

First, because removal jurisdiction is a creature of statute rather than based in the Constitution, courts construe removal jurisdiction narrowly. Such construction is necessary, in particular, to avoid impinging on the right of the State courts to adjudicate cases within their jurisdictions. By excluding counterclaim damages, the class of removable cases remains smaller.

Second, this approach is consistent with the rule that a defendant cannot remove a case to federal court on the basis of a defense or counterclaim that arises under federal law.

Third, it also comports “with the well-pleaded-complaint rule, which provides that federal jurisdiction exists only when a federal question is presented on the face of the plaintiff[s] properly pleaded complaint. The competing approach of not requiring the jurisdictional amount to be met in the complaint flies in the face of the rule.”

I therefore hold that a defendants’ counterclaim damages cannot satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement. But even assuming that counterclaim damages could count toward the amount in controversy, I would not be able to consider STC and New Par’s damages in any event.

As already noted, courts determine the existence of jurisdiction at the time of removal.

Here, STC and New Par did not file their counterclaim until after they removed the case to federal court. Accordingly, “considering the damages sought by the counterclaim would violate the rule that whether an action could have been brought in federal court originally is determined by the amount in controversy at the time of removal.”

For these reasons, defendants’ counterclaim damages cannot and do not satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement.²

B. Value of Declaratory Relief

"In actions seeking declaratory or injunctive relief, it is well established that the controversy is measured by the value of the object of the litigation." "Where a declaratory judgment, the amount in controversy is not necessarily the money judgment recovered, but rather the value of the consequences which may result from the litigation."

The Trustees contend that their complaint "does not put any amount in controversy" and "does not seek monetary damages." That argument doesn't hold much water.

In their reply brief, the Trustees contend that "the object of the litigation is to require the Defendants to bring their tower into compliance with Ottawa Township's Zoning Resolution—a procedure which should not cost the Defendants anywhere near $75,000." But the Trustees provide no explanation—let alone evidence—to support their position that the cost of complying with the proposed declaratory judgment will not exceed $75,000 or less.

The defendants contend that "the construction of the wireless telecommunications tower is valued in excess of $250,000 and the damages that will be or have been incurred by the Plaintiff and the Defendants as a result of the Plaintiff's conduct go upwards from there."

This contention, which is both conclusory and non-responsive, likewise does not establish whether the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000.

A defendant that removes a case to federal court ordinarily "need include only an allegation that the amount in controversy exceeds the jurisdictional threshold," but such an allegation will not suffice if "questioned by the court."

"When the amount in controversy is questioned, the defendant must provide evidence to support its allegation that the lawsuit involves an amount in controversy exceeding the jurisdictional threshold." The defendant must prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the case satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement.

I question the defendants' allegation, principally because it identifies only the value of the construction project, rather than the cost of making that project comply with the Township's zoning code.

The Trustees seek a declaratory judgment that the defendants must construct the tower in compliance with the Township's zoning code. Accordingly, the "value of the object of the litigation" would seem to be the costs that the defendants will incur to comply with that code, in the form of additional expenses to retrofit whatever portion of the tower is currently non-compliant, or the cost of redesigning the tower from scratch, the loss in value, if any, of a tower that must conform to the Township's regulations when compared to a tower that does not so comply, the sunnah of the project, and the like.

Because the record is silent on these issues, the parties must submit additional supporting evidence so that I can determine whether this court has subject-matter jurisdiction.

Ottawa Township Board of Trustees v. New Par, No. 3:17CV228 (N.D. Ohio Oct. 10, 2017)

CARR, Senior District Judge

This is a state-law declaratory-judgment case.

The defendants, New Par (d/b/a Verizon Wireless) and STC Towers, LLC, intend to build, or are in the process of building, a cellular communications tower in a residential district of Ottawa Township, Putnam County, Ohio.

Because the Township's zoning code forbids erection of cell towers in residentially zoned districts, the Ottawa Township Board of Trustees sued defendants in the Common Pleas Court of Putnam County, seeking an injunction that would require them to comply with the Township's zoning code and bar them "from continuing the construction" of the tower.

After defendants removed the suit to this court, the Trustees moved to remand, arguing that the case did not satisfy the amount in controversy requirement. They argued, first, that the case did not put any amount in controversy because their complaint sought only equitable relief. Second, the Trustees argued that I could not count the damages defendants sought by way of counterclaim when calculating the amount in controversy.

In a prior order, I agreed with the Trustees that the counterclaim damages could not satisfy the amount in controversy requirement.

But I disagreed that, simply because the Trustees sought declaratory and/or injunctive relief, there was no amount in controversy. Rather, and in accordance with Sixth Circuit precedent, I held that "the amount in controversy is measured by the value of the object of the litigation."

In my view, the object of the litigation:

seemed to be the costs that the defendants will incur to comply with the code, whether in the form of additional expenses to retrofit whatever portion of the tower is currently complete or to redesign the tower from scratch, the loss in value, if any, of a tower that must comply with the Township's regulations when compared to a tower that does not so comply, the sunk costs if the tower project cannot go forward, and the like.

Because the parties had not addressed the question, I ordered supplemental briefing.

In its supplemental filing, STC Towers argues that, if the Trustees were to succeed in this litigation, they "would be able to completely shut down the Defendants' project." In that case, STC Towers stands to lose the more than $312,000 it has already spent: nearly $83,000 in costs for "surveys, permits, site acquisition services and the like," and nearly $230,000 in costs for "land acquisition, the tower itself and construction."

Also at risk, according to STC Towers, is the anticipated revenue stream from operating the facility on behalf of New Par/Verizon. This amounts to $260,000 over a ten-year period.

In their supplemental filing, the Trustees do not dispute these figures.

Rather, they contend that “STC’s argument regarding the amount in controversy is restatement of the claim for damages in its counterclaim—it argues that the Defendants be injured by not being allowed to proceed with a project they took the risk of starting having complied with zoning requirements.” The Trustees go on to argue that monetary relief for damages does not establish subject matter jurisdiction.

As the Sixth Circuit has explained, “the costs of complying with an injunction, whether imposed by one plaintiff or many plaintiffs, may establish the amount in controversy.” But the question “is how to calculate that cost—whether from the perspective of the monetary value of the relief to the plaintiffs (which will generally be modest) or the monetary value of the injunction to the defendant (which may be great in some cases).”

A circuit split exists on that question, and the Sixth Circuit has not weighed in on it. The Trustees did not try to puzzle out an answer or try to find it in a crystal ball because the Trustees offered their own calculation of what the desired injunctive relief will cost the defendants.

In my prior order, I contemplated a number of costs that the requested injunctive relief might impose on the defense: the costs of retrofitting the tower, for example, or redesigning the tower so that it would comply with the zoning regulation or otherwise be acceptable to the town. Under some of these scenarios, it seemed possible that the defendants might have incurred costs that did not exceed $75,000.

Nevertheless, the Trustees have not explained—in practical, let alone plausible—terms—what an injunction forcing the defendants to “comply with the Town’s Zoning Resolution” would look like. Nor have they put a dollar figure on the many forms the injunction could take.

Moreover, given the Trustees’ claim that the defendants are building the tower in a zone zoned for such a use, I agree with the defendants that, should the Trustees prevail, that the defendants will have to abandon the project, thereby losing more than $75,000.

Accordingly, the only evidence in the record establishes that the value of the injunction the Trustees seek exceeds $75,000. I therefore have subject-matter jurisdiction under § 1332(a)(1), and I will deny the Trustees’ motion to remand.

Complete Business Solutions Group, Inc. v. Anon Pooch Pops, No. 20-724 (E.D. Pa. 2020)

PRATTER, District Judge

Pennsylvania law permits a prothonotary of any of its courts of common pleas to enter judgment by confession, in ministerial fashion, when a plaintiff files a complaint that, among other requisites, includes a copy of an instrument that the defendant has signed authorizing the entry of judgment.

²A confession of judgment is a legal device—usually a clause within a contract—in which a debtor agrees to allow a creditor, upon the nonoccurrence of a payment, to obtain a judgment against the debtor, often without advanced notice or a hearing. These clauses may also require the debtor to waive their right to assert any defense against the entry of judgment or be represented by an attorney appointed by the creditor.”
Wex Legal Dictionary.

In this case, confessed judgment was entered by the state court against Defendants, dog treat company Annie's Pooch Pops LLC, and its owner, Annie Hartig (hereinafter, "Annie's Pooch Pops"). The defendants removed the case, and filed a petition to strike or open the confessed judgment in this Court. Plaintiff Complete Business Solutions Group, Inc. seeks remand, and a stay of the litigation.

Because Annie's Pooch Pops has failed to demonstrate the requisite amount-in-controversy in this case, it has lost its bark. The Court will remand the case.

Legal Standard

When confronted with a motion to remand, the removing party has the burden of establishing the propriety of removal. "Removal statutes 'are to be strictly construed against removal, and all doubts resolved in favor of remand.'" Here, the contest lies in whether removing Defendants can prove the requisite amount-in-controversy sufficient to concretize their assertion of subject matter jurisdiction.

In 2011, Congress enacted a new Section 1446(c)(2) to the federal removal statute, with the intent to clarify the determination of the amount-in-controversy in removal cases. Interpreting that legislative change in Dart Cherokee Basin Operating Co., LLC v. Owens, 574 U.S. 81 (2014), the Supreme Court explained "If the plaintiff's complaint, filed in state court, demands monetary relief of a stated sum, that sum, if asserted in good faith, is 'deemed to be the amount in controversy.' § 1446(c)(2). When the plaintiff's complaint does not state the amount in controversy, the defendant's notice of removal may do so. § 1446(c)(2)(A)."

However, if the Court questions or the plaintiff contests the amount-in-controversy asserted by the removing defendant, the parties must put on evidence, and the defendant must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the amount-in-controversy is met. In making this determination, the Court generally looks to the complaint, but can look to other proofs.

Discussion

I. The parties' respective arguments.

The dispute hinges on the defendant's assertion concerning attorneys' fees. As an initial note, attorneys' fees may be considered as part of the amount-in-controversy if available to plaintiff's under their cause of action, and the parties agree that Complete Business Group may seek attorneys' fees under Pennsylvania law.

The parties' dispute centers on whether the value of the attorneys' fees is speculative or not. Annie's Pooch Pops specifically contends that the amount-in-controversy is met because Complete Business Group has left the question of fees open in its complaint, and because they believe, in good faith, that the litigation will develop in such a way that fees will inevitably reach the threshold requirement. Complete Business Group emphatically asserts that it has specifically averred the amount-in-controversy in the amount of $41,371.78. Because its fees are static, any additional right to fees is based on future events not yet knowable at the time of the filing of the complaint or removal.

II. Annie's Pooch Pops have not met their burden.

Annie's Pooch Pops have not met their burden in showing the amount-in-controversy to meet the federal requirement. While Complete Business Group reserves the right to pursue fees should Defendants challenge the confessed judgment, ultimately, the Court is bound one way or another, as to whether the amount-in-controversy will reach the required level. Indeed, the Court has no basis, nor has Annie's Pooch Pops provided one,^[10] for the claim that the amount-in-controversy will have almost doubled from Complete Business Group's current monetary demand of about $41,000, or in other words, the attorneys' fees will be at almost the same value of that present demand. Because the Court must rely on guesswork, Annie's Pooch Pops cannot establish federal subject matter jurisdiction.

^{10.} (n.4 in opinion) Defendants argue that the scorched-earth litigation practices of Fox Rothschild, Plaintiff's counsel, in similar cases where defense counsel is also counsel for the opposing parties, dictates that fees will be exorbitant in this case. Annie's Pooch Pops also contends that this case will be of such complexity and scope that the fees will surpass the federal threshold easily. Yet, these arguments are too speculative for the Court to determine now, that in fact, such proposed realities will come to pass.

3. Supplemental Jurisdiction

3.1 Constitutional Basis

United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715 (1966)

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

Respondent Paul Gibbs was awarded compensatory and punitive damages in this action against petitioner United Mine Workers of America (UMW) for alleged violations of § 303 of the Labor Management Relations Act ("LMRA").¹ The LMRA authorizes suits to recover damages for injury to business or property resulting from certain unlawful conduct by a labor union. Gibbs contended that the union's activity amounted to an unlawful "secondary boycott", i.e. a strike or picket directed at one person (Gibbs), for the purpose of forcing another employer (Consolidated) to recognize and bargain with the union. The federal court had subject matter jurisdiction over the § 303 claim, because it arises under federal law (the LMRA).

On August 15 and 16, 1960, armed members of Local 5881 forcibly prevented the opening of a new mine, threatening respondent and beating an organizer for the rival union. The miners in the local believed Consolidated had promised them the jobs at the new mine; they believed if anyone would do the work, they would. At this time, no representative of the international union, was present. George Gilbert, the UMW's field representative, who was in charge of the UMW's operations in Tennessee, including Local 5881, was away at Middlesboro, Kentucky, attending an Executive Board meeting.

when the members of the local discovered Grundy's plan; he did not return to the area until late in the day of August 16. There was uncontradicted testimony that he first learned of the violence while at the meeting, and returned with explicit instructions from his international union superiors to establish a limited picket line, to prevent any further violence, and to see to it that the strike did not spread to neighboring mines. There was no further violence at the mine site; a picket line was maintained there for nine months; and no further attempts were made to open the mine during that period.

Respondent lost his job as superintendent, and never entered into performance of his haulage contract. He testified that he soon began to lose other trucking contracts and mine leases he held in nearby areas. Claiming these effects to be the result of a concerted union plan against him, he sought recovery not against Local 5881 or its members, but only against petitioner, the international union. The suit was brought in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Tennessee, and jurisdiction was premised on allegations of secondary boycotts under § 303. The state law claim, for which jurisdiction was based upon the doctrine of pendent jurisdiction, asserted "an unlawful conspiracy and an unlawful boycott aimed at him and Grundy to maliciously, wantonly and willfully interfere with his contract of employment and with his contract of haulage."

The jury's verdict was that the UMW had violated both § 303 and state law. The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed. We granted certiorari. We reverse.

I.

A threshold question is whether the District Court properly entertained jurisdiction of the claim based on Tennessee law.

The Court held in Hurn v. Oursler, that state law claims are appropriate for federal court determination if they form a separate but parallel ground for relief also sought in a substantial claim based on federal law. The Court distinguished permissible from nonpermissible exercises of federal judicial power over state law claims by contrasting "a case where two distinct grounds in support of a single cause of action are alleged, one only of which presents a federal question, and a case where two separate and distinct causes of action are alleged, one only of which is federal in character. In the former, where the federal question averred is not plainly wanting in substance, the federal court, even though the federal ground be not established, may nevertheless retain and dispose of the case upon the non-federal ground; in the latter it may not do so upon the non-federal cause of action." The question is into which category the present action fell.

Hurn was decided in 1933, before the unification of law and equity by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. At the time, the meaning of "cause of action" was a subject of serious dispute; the phrase might "mean one thing for one purpose and something different for another." The Court in Hurn identified what it meant by the term by citation of Baltimore S. S. Co. v. Phillips, a case in which "cause of action" had been used to identify the operative scope of the doctrine of res judicata. In that case the Court had noted that "the whole tendency of our decisions is to require a plaintiff to try his whole cause of action and his whole case at one time." It stated its holding in the following language, quoted in part in the Hurn opinion:

Upon principle, it is perfectly plain that the respondent [a seaman suing for an injury while working aboard ship] suffered but one actionable wrong and was entitled to but one single primary right of the plaintiff, namely, the right of bodily safety, whether the acts causing such invasion were one or many, simple or complex.

A cause of action does not consist of facts, but of the unlawful violation of a right which they show. The number and variety of the facts alleged do not establish more than one cause of action so long as their result, whether they be considered severally or in combination, is the violation of but one right by a single legal wrong. The mere multiplication of grounds of negligence or other causes of action, all of which are causative of the same injury, does not result in multiplying the causes of action. ‘The facts are means, and not the end. They do not constitute the cause of action, but they show its existence, and make the wrong appear.’

With the adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the unified form of action, the controversy over “cause of action” abated. The phrase remained as the keystone of the test, however, and, as commentators have noted, has been the source of considerable difficulty. Under the Rules, the impulse is toward entertaining the broadest possible scope of jurisdiction consistent with fairness to the parties; joinder of claims, parties and remedies is encouraged. Yet because the Hurn question involves issues of jurisdictional convenience, there has been some tendency to limit its application to cases in which state and federal claims are, as in Hurn, “little more than the equivalent of different labels characterizing the same group of circumstances.”

This limited approach is unnecessarily grudging. Pendent jurisdiction, in the sense of power, exists whenever there is a claim “arising under the Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority,” U. S. Const., art. III, § 2, and the relationship between that claim and the state claim permits the court to hear the entire action before the court comprises but one constitutional “case.” The state claim must have substance sufficient to confer subject matter jurisdiction on the court. The federal claims must derive from a common nucleus of operative fact. But if, considering regard to their federal or state character, a plaintiff’s claims are such that he would be expected to try them all in one judicial proceeding, then, assuming substantiality of the state issues, there is power in federal courts to hear the whole.

That power need not be exercised in every case in which it is found to exist. It has been recognized that pendent jurisdiction is a doctrine of discretion, not of plaintiff. The justification lies in considerations of judicial economy, convenience and fairness. If these are not present a federal court should hesitate to exercise jurisdiction over state claims even though bound to apply state law to them. Needless decisions of state law should be avoided both as a matter of comity and to promote justice between the parties, by procuring a surer-footed reading of applicable law. Certainly, if the federal claims are dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the state claims should be dismissed as well. Similarly, if it appears that the state issues substantially predominate, whether by reason of the proof, of the scope of the issues raised, or of the comprehensiveness of the remedy, the state claims may be dismissed without prejudice and left for resolution to state tribunals. There may, on the other hand, be situations in which the state claim is so closely tied up with the federal policy that the argument for exercise of pendent jurisdiction is particularly strong.

In the present case, for example, the allowable scope of the state claim implicates the federal doctrine of pre-emption; while this interrelationship does not create statutory federal question jurisdiction, its existence is relevant to the exercise of discretion. Finally, there may be reasons independent of jurisdictional considerations, such as the likelihood of jury confusion in treating divergent legal theories of relief, that would justify separating state and federal claims for trial. If so, jurisdiction should ordinarily be refused.

The question of power will ordinarily be resolved on the pleadings. But the issue whether pendent jurisdiction has been properly assumed is one which remains open throughout the litigation. Pretrial procedures or even the trial itself may reveal a substantial hegemony of state law claims, or likelihood of jury confusion, which could not have been anticipated at the pleading stage. Although it will of course be appropriate to take account in this circumstance of the already completed course of the litigation, dismissal of the state claim might even then be merited. For example, it may appear that the plaintiff was well aware of the nature of his proofs and the relative importance of his claims; recognition of a federal court's wide latitude to decide ancillary questions of state law does not imply that it must tolerate a litigant's effort to impose upon it what is in effect only a state law case. Once it appears that a state claim constitutes the real body of a case, to which the federal claim is only an appendage, the state claim may fairly be dismissed.

3.2 Statutory Basis

(a) Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c) or as expressly provided otherwise by Federal statute, in any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction, the district courts shall have supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related to claims in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution. Such supplemental jurisdiction shall include claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional parties.

(b) In any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction founded solely on section 1332 of this title, the district courts shall not have supplemental jurisdiction under subsection (a) over claims by plaintiffs against persons made parties under Rule 14, 19, 20, or 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or over claims by persons proposed to be joined as plaintiffs under Rule 19 of such rules, or seeking to intervene as plaintiffs under Rule 24 of such rules, when exercising supplemental jurisdiction over such claims would be inconsistent with the jurisdictional requirements of section 1332.

(c) The district courts may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim under subsection (a) if—

- (1) the claim raises a novel or complex issue of State law,

- (2) the claim substantially predominates over the claim or claims over which court has original jurisdiction,
 - (3) the district court has dismissed all claims over which it has original jurisdiction,
 - (4) in exceptional circumstances, there are other compelling reasons for jurisdiction.
- (d) The period of limitations for any claim asserted under subsection (a), and for any cause of action arising out of or related to the same transaction or series of transactions, in the same action that is voluntarily dismissed at the same time as or after the dismissal of another claim under subsection (a), shall be tolled while the claim is pending and for a period of one year after it is dismissed unless State law provides for a longer tolling period.
- (e) As used in this section, the term "State" includes the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and any territory or possession of the United States.

3.3 Same Case or Controversy: § 1367(a)

Jones v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 358 F.3d 205 (2d Cir. 2004)

NEWMAN, Circuit Judge

This appeal concerns the availability of subject matter jurisdiction for counterclaims. It also demonstrates the normal utility of early decision of a motion for class certification. Defendant-Appellant Ford Motor Credit Company ("Ford Credit") appealed from a June 14, 2002, judgment of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York (Lawrence M. McKenna, District Judge) dismissing for lack of jurisdiction its counterclaims against three of the four Plaintiffs-Appellees and its conditional class action complaint against members of the putative class that the Plaintiffs-Appellees seek to certify. The court held that supplemental jurisdiction authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 1337 may be available for the Plaintiffs' counterclaims, but that the District Court's discretion under subsection 1337(c) should not be exercised in this case until a ruling on the Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. The court vacated and remanded.

Background

Plaintiffs-Appellees Joyce Jones, Martha L. Edwards, Lou Cooper, and Vincent C. Johnson ("Plaintiffs"), individually and as class representatives, sued Ford Credit and its co-defendant, Ford Motor Company, for race discrimination under the Equal Credit Opportunity Act ("ECOA"). They had purchased vehicles under Ford Credit's financing plan. They alleged that the financing plan discriminated on the basis of race.

against African-Americans. Although the financing rate was primarily based on objective criteria, Ford Credit permitted its dealers to mark up the rate, using subjective criteria to assess non-risk charges. The Plaintiffs alleged that the mark-up policy penalized African-American customers with higher rates than those imposed on similarly situated Caucasian customers.

In its Answer, Ford Credit denied the charges of racial discrimination and also asserted state-law counterclaims against Jones, Edwards, and Cooper for the amounts of their unpaid car loans. Ford Credit alleged that Jones was in default on her obligations under her contract for the purchase of a 1995 Ford Windstar, and that Edwards and Cooper were in default on payments for their joint purchase of a 1995 Mercury Cougar. Additionally, in the event that a class was certified, Ford Credit asserted conditional counterclaims against any member of that class who was in default on a car loan from Ford Credit. The Plaintiffs moved to dismiss Ford Credit's counterclaims for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, lack of personal jurisdiction, improper venue, and failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted.

The District Court granted the Plaintiffs' motion and dismissed Ford Credit's counterclaims, summarizing its reasons for doing so as follows: "Defendant's counterclaims do not meet the standard for compulsory counterclaims, and pursuant to § 1367(c)(4), there are compelling reasons to decline to exercise jurisdiction over the counterclaims."

In reaching these conclusions, Judge McKenna acknowledged some uncertainty. After determining that the counterclaims were permissive, he expressed doubt as to the jurisdictional consequence of that determination. On the one hand, he believed, as the Plaintiffs maintain, that permissive counterclaims must be dismissed if they lack an independent basis of federal jurisdiction. On the other hand, he acknowledged that "there was some authority to suggest that the court should determine, based on the particular circumstances of the case, whether it had authority to exercise supplemental jurisdiction under § 1367(a)" over a counterclaim, regardless of whether it was compulsory or permissive.

To resolve his uncertainty, Judge McKenna initially ruled that the counterclaims, being permissive, "must be dismissed for lack of an independent basis of federal jurisdiction." He then ruled that, if he was wrong and if supplemental jurisdiction under section 1367 was available, he would still dismiss the counterclaims in the exercise of the discretion subsection 1367(c) gives district courts.

On March 27, 2003, the District Court entered judgment pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 54(b) in favor of the Plaintiffs, dismissing Ford Credit's counterclaims without prejudice. Ford Credit appeals from this decision.

Discussion

II. Is There Jurisdiction over the Permissive Counterclaims?

For several decades federal courts have asserted that permissive counterclaims require an independent basis of jurisdiction, i.e., that the counterclaim must be maintainable in the district court on some jurisdictional basis that would have sufficed had it been filed as a separate action. The origin of this proposition, the questioning of it before the authorization of supplemental jurisdiction in section 1367, and the impact of the new rule upon the proposition all merit careful consideration.

The impact of section 1367. The judge-made doctrine of ancillary jurisdiction, which had been invoked to provide a jurisdictional basis for compulsory counterclaims, was given constitutional undergirding when Congress added section 1367 to Title 28 in 1990. The new section gave “supplemental” jurisdiction explicitly extended federal courts’ authority to “all other claims so related to claims in the action within [the district court’s] original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution.”

The explicit extension to the limit of Article III of a federal court’s jurisdiction of “other claims” sought to be litigated with an underlying claim within federal jurisdiction transformed the jurisdictional basis of permissive counterclaims into constitutional terms. After section 1367, it is no longer sufficient for courts to assert, without any reason other than dicta or even analogy from the era of judge-created ancillary jurisdiction, that permissive counterclaims fall within the court’s independent jurisdiction. Rising to the challenge, after enactment of section 1367, the Seventh Circuit, strikingly similar to our pending case, the Seventh Circuit vacated the dismissal of Ford Credit’s counterclaim and remanded for exercise of the discretion contemplated by Channell v. Citicorp National Services, Inc., 89 F.3d 379 (7th Cir.1996). Channell held that a creditor’s counterclaims to collect debts in a class action alleging violations of the Consumer Leasing Act. As Judge Easterbrook stated, “Now that Congress has codified the standard of supplemental jurisdiction in § 1367(a), courts should use the language of the statute to define the outer limits of their powers.” He viewed section 1367’s reach to the constitutional limits of Article III, but only “a loose factual connection between the claims,” a standard that appears to be broader than the Gibbs test of “a common nucleus of operative facts,” appropriate for permitting a plaintiff’s non-federal claim. In Channell, he readily found the requisite “loose connection” to exist between the Consumer Leasing Act claim and the debt collection counterclaim.

We share the view that section 1367 has displaced, rather than codified, what was inherent in the earlier view that a permissive counterclaim requires independent jurisdiction in the sense of federal question or diversity jurisdiction. The issue in this case therefore is whether supplemental jurisdiction is available for Ford Credit’s counterclaims.

III. Application of Section 1367’s Standards for Supplemental Jurisdiction

Whether or not the Gibbs “common nucleus” standard provides the outer limit of the “case,” and is therefore a requirement for entertaining a permissive counterclaim that lacks a jurisdictional basis, the facts of Ford Credit’s counterclaims and those of the ECOA claims satisfy that standard, even though the relationship is not such as would counterclaims compulsory. The counterclaims and the underlying claim bear a sufficient factual relationship (if one is necessary) to constitute the same “case” within the meaning of Article III and hence of section 1367. Both the ECOA claim and the debt collection claims originate from the Plaintiffs’ decisions to purchase Ford cars.

Satisfying the constitutional “case” standard of subsection 1367(a), however, does not end the inquiry a district court is obliged to make with respect to permissive counterclaims. A trial court must consider whether any of the four grounds set out in subsection 1367(c) are present to an extent that would warrant the exercise of discretion to decline assertion of supplemental jurisdiction. Subsection 1367(c) provides:

The district courts may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim under subsection (a) if —

1. the claim raises a novel or complex issue of State law,
2. the claim substantially predominates over the claim or claims over which the district court has original jurisdiction,
3. the district court has dismissed all claims over which it has original jurisdiction, or
4. in exceptional circumstances, there are other compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction.

We have indicated that, where at least one of the subsection 1367(c) factors is applicable, a district court should not decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction unless it also determines that doing so would not promote the values articulated in Gibbs: economy, convenience, fairness, and comity.

Clearly the exception set forth in subsection 1367(c)(1) does not apply since Ford Credit’s counterclaims do not raise a novel or complex issue of state law, but merely a standard contract question. Nor does subsection 1367(c)(3) apply since the District Court has not dismissed all claims over which it has original jurisdiction. That leaves subsections 1367(c)(2), permitting declination of supplemental jurisdiction where “the counterclaim substantially predominates over the claim or claims over which the district court has original jurisdiction,” and 1367(c)(4), permitting declination “in exceptional circumstances, where there are other compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction.” The District Court apparently based its decision on subsection 1367(c)(4), since it cited only that subsection in its opinion, but some of the concerns it discussed implicate the substantial predominance analysis of subsection 1367(c)(2) as well.

Whether Ford Credit’s counterclaims “predominate” over the Plaintiffs’ claims and whether there are “exceptional circumstances” for declining jurisdiction cannot properly be determined until a decision has been made on the Plaintiffs’ motion for class certification. Both the applicability of subsections 1367(c)(2) and (4), and the exercise of a district court’s discretion in the event either or both are ruled applicable will be significantly influenced by the existence of a large class as sought by the Plaintiffs. The District Court’s conclusions that it would be “unfair and inexpedient” to require out-of-state class members to litigate Ford’s state law debt claims in New York, and that allowing the counterclaims might dissuade potential plaintiffs from joining the class, were therefore premature.

Accordingly, we remand this case with directions to rule on the class certification, then, in light of that ruling, to proceed to determine whether to exercise or decline subject matter jurisdiction.

Ginwright v. Exeter Finance Corp., No. TDC-16-CV-00011 (D. Md. 2016)

CHUANG, District Judge

On February 26, 2016, Plaintiff Billy Ginwright filed this action against Defendant Exeter Finance Corporation (“Exeter”) for violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act (“TCPA”), 47 U.S.C. § 227 (2012), and the Maryland Telephone Consumer Protection Act (“MTCPA”), Md. Code Ann., Com. Litig. § 11-101 et seq. On April 11, 2016, Exeter filed its Amended Answer and Counterclaim, alleging that Ginwright breached the contract that led Exeter to seek to collect a debt by telephone. Pending before the Court is Ginwright’s Motion to Dismiss Exeter’s Counterclaim. For the following reasons, the motion is granted.

Background

In May 2013, Ginwright entered into a contract with BW Auto Outlet of Hanover, Maryland, to finance the purchase of a vehicle. Within the contract, BW Auto Outlet assigned all rights and obligations under the contract to Exeter. In his Complaint, Ginwright alleges that in seeking to collect on the debt under the contract, Exeter called Ginwright’s cellular phone “hundreds of times” by an automatic dialing system. Ginwright maintains that Exeter made the calls for no legitimate business purposes and without his prior express consent. He also asserts that he repeatedly requested Exeter to cease calling him, to no avail. Rather, Exeter representatives told him that they would stop calling his cellular phone, and that the calls would continue through the automatic dialing system. As a result, with rare exceptions, Ginwright received three to seven calls every day between December 4 and December 17, 2014; March 5 and April 29, 2015; and June 5, 2015.

In its Counterclaim, Exeter alleges that Ginwright breached the original contract when he failed to make car payments, requiring Exeter to repossess the vehicle. Exeter contends that the sale of the vehicle and the application of the sale proceeds to the full amount that Ginwright owed a remainder of $23,782.17 under the contract as of May 3, 2016.

Discussion

Ginwright is seeking dismissal of the counterclaim pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Ginwright asserts that Exeter has failed to establish any independent basis for jurisdiction over the counterclaim and that this Court may not exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the counterclaim because it is a permissive counterclaim. Exeter counters that, since the enactment of 28 U.S.C. § 1337, a court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a permissive counterclaim, and that, in any event, the counterclaim is compulsory.

I. Legal Standard

It is the burden of the party asserting jurisdiction to show that subject matter jurisdiction exists. Rule 12(b)(1) allows a party to move for dismissal when it believes that the claimant has failed to make that showing. When a plaintiff asserts that the facts alleged in a counterclaim are not sufficient to establish subject matter jurisdiction, the allegations in the counterclaim are assumed to be true under the same standard as in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, and the motion must be denied if the counterclaim alleges sufficient facts to invoke subject matter jurisdiction.

II. Supplemental Jurisdiction

In asserting its counterclaim, Exeter does not allege that the Court has federal question jurisdiction or diversity jurisdiction. Rather, Exeter asserts that jurisdiction is proper under the supplemental jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1337. In determining whether a court has supplemental jurisdiction over a counterclaim, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit has traditionally distinguished between compulsory counterclaims, which must be stated by a defendant in its answer, and permissive counterclaims, which need not be. The Fourth Circuit has held that, absent an independent basis of jurisdiction, a federal court has supplemental jurisdiction over a compulsory counterclaim but not a permissive counterclaim.

Exeter argues that the Fourth Circuit rule has been superseded by the 1990 enactment of the supplemental jurisdiction statute, which provides that “in any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction, the district courts shall have supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related to” claims already within the court’s jurisdiction “that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution.” 28 U.S.C. § 1337(a). Exeter contends that the “all other claims” language encompasses counterclaims and that the “same case or controversy” language encompasses at least certain types of permissive counterclaims.

Several courts of appeals have agreed with this view and have interpreted § 1337 to permit the exercise of supplemental jurisdiction over “at least some permissive counterclaims.” Within the Fourth Circuit, however, district courts have continued to follow the binding precedent of Painter and limit supplemental jurisdiction to compulsory counterclaims.

In Williams, the court offered a rationale for the continuing applicability of the Fourth Circuit rule based on the premise that § 1337 did not materially alter the jurisdictional landscape applicable to this issue. The United States Supreme Court has stated that § 1337 “codified” existing common law doctrines of pendent and ancillary jurisdiction “under a common heading” of supplemental jurisdiction. The pre-§ 1337 doctrine of pendent jurisdiction provided federal jurisdiction over claims that “derive from a common nucleus of operative fact” such that “the entire action before the court comprises but one constitutional ‘case.’” In International College of Surgeons, when the Court applied the “common nucleus of operative fact” test to conclude that there was supplemental jurisdiction under the “same case or controversy” requirement of § 1337, it effectively equated the two tests. In Williams, the court concluded that because the “common nucleus of operative fact” standard remains applicable after § 1337, the Fourth Circuit rule of providing supplemental jurisdiction over compulsory counterclaims only, which was premised on that pre-§ 1367 standard, remains intact. Where the Fourth Circuit has not addressed § 1367 altered the rule articulated in Whigham and Painter, the district courts within the circuit continue to adhere to that rule, and a principled basis exists for doing so, the Court need not deviate from Fourth Circuit precedent and will continue to apply the rule that a federal court may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over compulsory counterclaims only.

IV. 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)

Even if the Court could exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a permissive counterclaim, the Court may decline to do so under certain circumstances. 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c). A court may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim where the “claim substantially predominates over the claim or claims out of which it arises,” the court has original jurisdiction, and where, “in exceptional circumstances, there are compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction.” Here, the more fact-intensive breadth of Exeter’s counterclaim, which may involve analysis of whether Exeter following state law rules for repossession and resale, is likely to substantially predominate over the TCPA claim, depending on whether Ginwright consented to receive telephone calls from Exeter on his cell phone.

Moreover, public policy concerns support declining jurisdiction. Federal consumer protection statutes seek to protect consumers from unscrupulous practices “regardless of whether the debt actually exists.” In the context of TILA, the Fourth Circuit has cautioned that allowing a lender use the federal proceedings as an opportunity to pursue private claims against a borrower would impede expeditious enforcement of the federal penalty and involve federal courts in debt collection matters having no federal significance.” This same concern applies here. Accordingly, having concluded that Exeter’s counterclaim would substantially predominate over the TCPA claim, the Court, even if authorized to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the counterclaim, would decline to do so.

Supplemental Jurisdiction & Counterclaims

As the Jones and Ginwright cases illustrate, the consensus among the federal courts is that permissive counterclaims always satisfy the “same case or controversy” requirement for supplemental jurisdiction. However, there is some disagreement regarding the exercise of supplemental jurisdiction over permissive counterclaims.

One view is that the “same case or controversy” requirement under § 1367(a) is somewhat broader than the “same transaction or occurrence” standard under Rule 13. Under that view, there might sometimes be a functional relationship between a plaintiff’s claim and a permissive counterclaim to satisfy § 1367(a). See Jones.

The contrary view is that the “same case or controversy” requirement under § 1367(a) and the “same transaction or occurrence” standard under Rule 13 are functionally equivalent. Under that view, supplemental jurisdiction over a permissive counterclaim is never allowed. See Ginwright.

3.4 “Pendant Party” Claims: § 1337(b)

Exxon Mobile Corp. v. Allapattah Services, Inc., 545 U.S. 546 (2005)

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this opinion, the Court decided two cases: Rosario Ortega v. Star-Kist Foods, Inc. (Case No. 04-79) and Allapattah Services, Inc. v. Exxon Corp. (Case No. 04-70). The portions of the opinion included here pertain to Rosario Ortega, which involved a young girl who was severely injured by a sharp edge on a tuna fish can. The Allapattah case raised the same issue in the context of a class action suit.

These consolidated cases present the question whether a federal court in a diversity case may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over additional plaintiffs whose claims do not meet the minimum amount-in-controversy requirement, provided the claims are part of the same controversy as the claims of plaintiffs who do allege a sufficient amount in controversy. The decision turns on the correct interpretation of 28 U.S.C. § 1337. The question has divided the Courts of Appeals, and we granted certiorari to resolve the conflict.

We hold that, where the other elements of jurisdiction are present and at least one plaintiff in the action satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement, § 1337 does not bar a federal court from exercising supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of other plaintiffs in the same Article III case if those claims are for less than the jurisdictional amount specified in the statute setting forth the requirements for diversity jurisdiction. We affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit in [Allapattah Services], and we reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit in [Rosario-Ortega].

I

In the other case now before us the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit took a different approach to the question of the meaning of § 1337(a). In that case, a 9-year-old girl sued Star-Kist in a diversity case in the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, seeking damages for the severe injuries she received when she sliced her finger on a tuna can. Her family members joined in the suit, seeking damages for emotional distress and certain medical expenses. The District Court granted summary judgment to Star-Kist, finding that none of the plaintiffs met the amount-in-controversy requirement. The Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, however, held that the injured girl, but not her family members, had made allegations of damages in excess of the requisite amount.

The Court of Appeals then addressed whether, in light of the fact that one plaintiff satisfied the requirements for original jurisdiction, supplemental jurisdiction over the remaining claims was proper under § 1337. The court held that § 1337 authorizes supplemental jurisdiction only when the district court has original jurisdiction over the action, and that it is in this case original jurisdiction is lacking if one plaintiff fails to satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement.

The district courts of the United States, as we have said many times, are “courts of limited jurisdiction. They possess only that power authorized by Constitution and statute.” Congress has provided a federal forum for plaintiffs who seek to vindicate federal rights, Congress has limited the district courts original jurisdiction in federal-question cases—civil actions brought under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. 28 U.S.C. § 1331. In order to provide a neutral forum for what have come to be known as diversity cases, Congress also district courts original jurisdiction in civil actions between citizens of different States, between U. S. citizens and foreign citizens, or by foreign states against U. S. citizens. § 1332. To ensure that diversity jurisdiction does not flood the federal courts with minor disputes, § 1332(a) requires that the matter in controversy in a diversity case exceed a specified amount, currently $75,000.

Although the district courts may not exercise jurisdiction absent a statutory basis, it is well established—in certain classes of cases—that, once a court has original jurisdiction over some claims in the action, it may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over additional claims that are part of the same case or controversy. The leading modern case for this principle is Mine Workers v. Gibbs. In Gibbs, the plaintiff alleged the defendant's conduct violated both federal and state law. The District Court, Gibbs held, had original jurisdiction over the action based on the federal claims. Gibbs confirmed that the District Court had the additional power (though not the obligation) to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over related state claims that arose from the same Article III case or controversy.

We have not, however, applied Gibbs' expansive interpretive approach to other aspects of the jurisdictional statutes. For instance, we have consistently interpreted § 1332 as requiring complete diversity: In a case with multiple plaintiffs and multiple defendants, the presence in the action of a single plaintiff from the same State as a single defendant deprives the district court of original diversity jurisdiction over the entire action. The complete diversity requirement is not mandated by the Constitution, or by the plain text of § 1332(a). The Court, nonetheless, has adhered to the complete diversity rule in light of the purpose of the diversity requirement, which is to provide a federal forum for important disputes where state courts might favor, or be perceived as favoring, home-state litigants. The presence of parties from the same State on both sides of a case dispels this concern, eliminating a principal reason for conferring § 1332 jurisdiction over any of the claims in the action. In order for a federal court to invoke supplemental jurisdiction under Gibbs, it must first have original jurisdiction over at least one claim in the action. Incomplete diversity destroys original jurisdiction with respect to all claims, so there is nothing to which supplemental jurisdiction can adhere.

In Finley we emphasized that “whatever we say regarding the scope of jurisdiction conferred by a particular statute can of course be changed by Congress.” In 1990, Congress accepted the invitation. It passed the Judicial Improvements Act, which enacted § 1367, the provision which controls these cases.

Section 1367(a) is a broad grant of supplemental jurisdiction over other claims within the same case or controversy, as long as the action is one in which the district courts would have original jurisdiction. The last sentence of § 1367(a) makes it clear that the grant of supplemental jurisdiction extends to claims involving joinder or intervention of additional parties. The single question before us, therefore, is whether a diversity case in which the claims of some plaintiffs satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement, but the claims of other plaintiffs do not, presents a “civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction.” If the answer is yes, § 1367(a) confers supplemental jurisdiction over all claims, including those that do not independently satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement, if the claims are part of an Article III case or controversy. If the answer is no, § 1367(a) is inapplicable and, in light of the holdings in Clark and Zahn, the district court has no statutory basis for exercising supplemental jurisdiction over the additional claims.

We now conclude the answer must be yes. When the well-pleaded complaint contains one claim that satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement, and there are no other jurisdictional defects, the district court, beyond all question, has original jurisdiction over the claim. The presence of other claims in the complaint, over which the district court lacks original jurisdiction, is of no moment. If the court has original jurisdiction over a claim in the complaint, it has original jurisdiction over a “civil action” within the meaning of the statute, even if the civil action over which it has jurisdiction comprises fewer claims than were asserted in the complaint. Once the court determines it has original jurisdiction over the claim, it can turn to the question whether it has a constitutional and statutory basis for exercising supplemental jurisdiction over the other claims in the action.

Section 1367(a) commences with the direction that §§ 1367(b) and (c), or other relevant provisions of the statute, may provide specific exceptions, but otherwise § 1367(a) is a broad jurisdictional grant. The distinction drawn between pendent-claim and pendent-party cases. In fact, the language of § 1367(a) makes clear that the provision grants supplemental jurisdiction over claims joined by joinder or intervention of additional parties. The terms of § 1367 do not acknowledge a meaningful distinction between pendent jurisdiction and the doctrine of so-called ancillary jurisdiction. Though the doctrines of pendent and ancillary jurisdiction developed separately at different times, the Court has recognized that the doctrines are “two species of the same problem”. Nothing in § 1367 indicates a congressional intent to recognize, preserve, or acknowledge some meaningful, substantive distinction between the jurisdictional categories historically labeled pendent and ancillary.

If § 1367(a) were the sum total of the relevant statutory language, our holding would rest on that language alone. The statute, of course, instructs us to examine § 1367(b) to determine whether any of its exceptions apply, so we proceed to that section. While § 1367(b) qualifies the jurisdiction of § 1367(a), it does not withdraw supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of the additional parties at issue here. The specific exceptions to § 1367(a) contained in § 1367(b) and § 1333 provide additional support for our conclusion that § 1367(a) confers supplemental jurisdiction over these claims. Section 1367(b), which applies only to diversity cases, withdraws supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of plaintiffs proposed to be joined as indispensable parties under Rule 19 of the Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19, or who seek to intervene pursuant to Rule 23. The language of the text of § 1367(b), however, withdraws supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of plaintiffs permissively joined under Rule 20 (like the additional plaintiffs in [Rosario Ortega]).¹⁰ Our inference, indeed the necessary, inference is that § 1367 confers supplemental jurisdiction over claims by Rule 20 and Rule 23 plaintiffs. This inference, at least with respect to Rule 20 plaintiffs, is strengthened by the fact that § 1367(b) explicitly excludes supplemental jurisdiction from claims against defendants joined under Rule 20.

We cannot accept the view, urged by some of the parties, commentators, and Courts of Appeals, that a district court lacks original jurisdiction over a civil action unless the court has original jurisdiction over every claim in the complaint. As we understand this position, it requires assuming either that all claims in the complaint must stand or fall as a single, indivisible “civil action” as a matter of definitional necessity —what we will refer to as the “indivisibility theory”—or else that the inclusion of a claim or party falling outside the district court’s original jurisdiction somehow contaminates every other claim in the complaint, depriving the court of original jurisdiction over any of these claims—what we will refer to as the “contamination theory.”

The indivisibility theory is easily dismissed, as it is inconsistent with the whole notion of supplemental jurisdiction. If a district court must have original jurisdiction over every claim in the complaint in order to have “original jurisdiction” over a “civil action,” then in Gibbs there was no civil action of which the district court could assume original jurisdiction under § 1331, and so no basis for exercising supplemental jurisdiction over any of the claims. The indivisibility theory is further belied by our practice—in both federal-question and diversity cases—of allowing federal courts to cure jurisdictional defects by dismissing the offending parties rather than dismissing the entire action. If the presence of jurisdictionally problematic claims in the complaint meant the district court was without original jurisdiction over the single, indivisible civil action before it, then the district court would have to dismiss the whole action rather than particular parties.

We also find it unconvincing to say that the definitional indivisibility theory applies in the context of diversity cases but not in the context of federal-question cases. The broad and general language of the statute does not permit this result. The contention is premised on the notion that the phrase “original jurisdiction of all civil actions” means different things in §§ 1331 and 1332. It is implausible, however, to say that the identical phrase means one thing (original jurisdiction in all actions where at least one claim in the complaint meets the following requirements) in § 1331 and something else (original jurisdiction in all actions where every claim in the complaint meets the following requirements) in § 1332.

The contamination theory, as we have noted, can make some sense in the special context of the complete diversity requirement because the presence of nondiverse parties on both sides of a lawsuit eliminates the justification for providing a federal forum. The theory, however, makes little sense with respect to the amount-in-controversy requirement, which is meant to ensure that a dispute is sufficiently important to warrant federal-court attention. The presence of a single nondiverse party may eliminate the fear of bias with respect to all claims, but the presence of a claim that falls short of the minimum amount in controversy does nothing to reduce the importance of the claims that do meet this requirement.

It is fallacious to suppose, simply from the proposition that § 1332 imposes both the diversity requirement and the amount-in-controversy requirement, that the contamination theory germane to the former is also relevant to the latter. There is no inherent logical connection between the amount-in-controversy requirement and § 1332 diversity jurisdiction. After all, federal-question jurisdiction once had an amount-in-controversy requirement as well. If such a requirement were revived under § 1331, it is clear beyond peradventure that § 1367(a) provides supplemental jurisdiction over federal-question cases where some, but not all, of the federal-law claims involve a sufficient amount in controversy. In other words, § 1367(a) unambiguously overrules the holding and the result in Clark. If that is so, however, it would be extraordinary to say that § 1367 did not also overrule Zahn, a case that was based in substantial part on the holding in Clark.

We also reject the argument that while the presence of additional claims over which the court lacks jurisdiction does not mean the civil action is outside the purview of the statute, the presence of additional parties does. The basis for this distinction is not altogether clear, but it is in considerable tension with statutory text. Section 1367(a) applies by its terms to actions in which at least one party is a citizen of a state different from the district court, of which the district courts have original jurisdiction, and the last sentence of § 1367(b) contemplates that the court may have supplemental jurisdiction over additional parties. It cannot be the case that the presence of those parties destroys the court's original jurisdiction over the claims of the original parties, which are within the meaning of § 1367(a), over a civil action otherwise properly before it. A court that expressly withholds supplemental jurisdiction in diversity cases over claims by plaintiffs who are joined as indispensable parties under Rule 19. If joinder of such parties were sufficient to deprive the district court of original jurisdiction over the civil action within the meaning of § 1367(a), then the specific limitation on supplemental jurisdiction in § 1367(b) would be superfluous. The argument that the presence of additional parties removes the civil action from the purview of § 1367(a) also would mean that § 1367 left the Finley result undisturbed. Finley, after all, involved a Federal Tort Claims Act suit against a federal defendant and state-law claims against state defendants not otherwise subject to federal jurisdiction. Yet all concede that one purpose of § 1367 was to change the result reached in Finley.

Finally, it is suggested that our interpretation of § 1367(a) creates an anomaly relative to the exceptions listed in § 1367(b): It is not immediately obvious why Congress would grant supplemental jurisdiction over plaintiffs joined as parties “needed for just adjudication” under Rule 19 but would allow supplemental jurisdiction over plaintiffs permissively under Rule 20. The omission of Rule 20 plaintiffs from the list of exceptions in § 1367(b) has been characterized as an “unintentional drafting gap”. If that is the case, it is up to Congress rather than the courts to fix it. The omission may seem odd, but it is not absurd. An alternative explanation for the different treatment of Rules 19 and 20 is that Congress was concerned that giving supplemental jurisdiction to Rule 19 plaintiffs would allow circumvention of the original jurisdiction diversity rule: A nondiverse plaintiff might be omitted intentionally from the original complaint and joined later under Rule 19 as a necessary party. The contamination theory described above, if applicable, means this ruse would fail, but Congress may have wanted to make assurance more certain. More generally, Congress may have concluded that federal jurisdiction is only appropriate if the district court would have original jurisdiction over the claims of all those plaintiffs whose claims are so essential to the action that they could be joined under Rule 19.

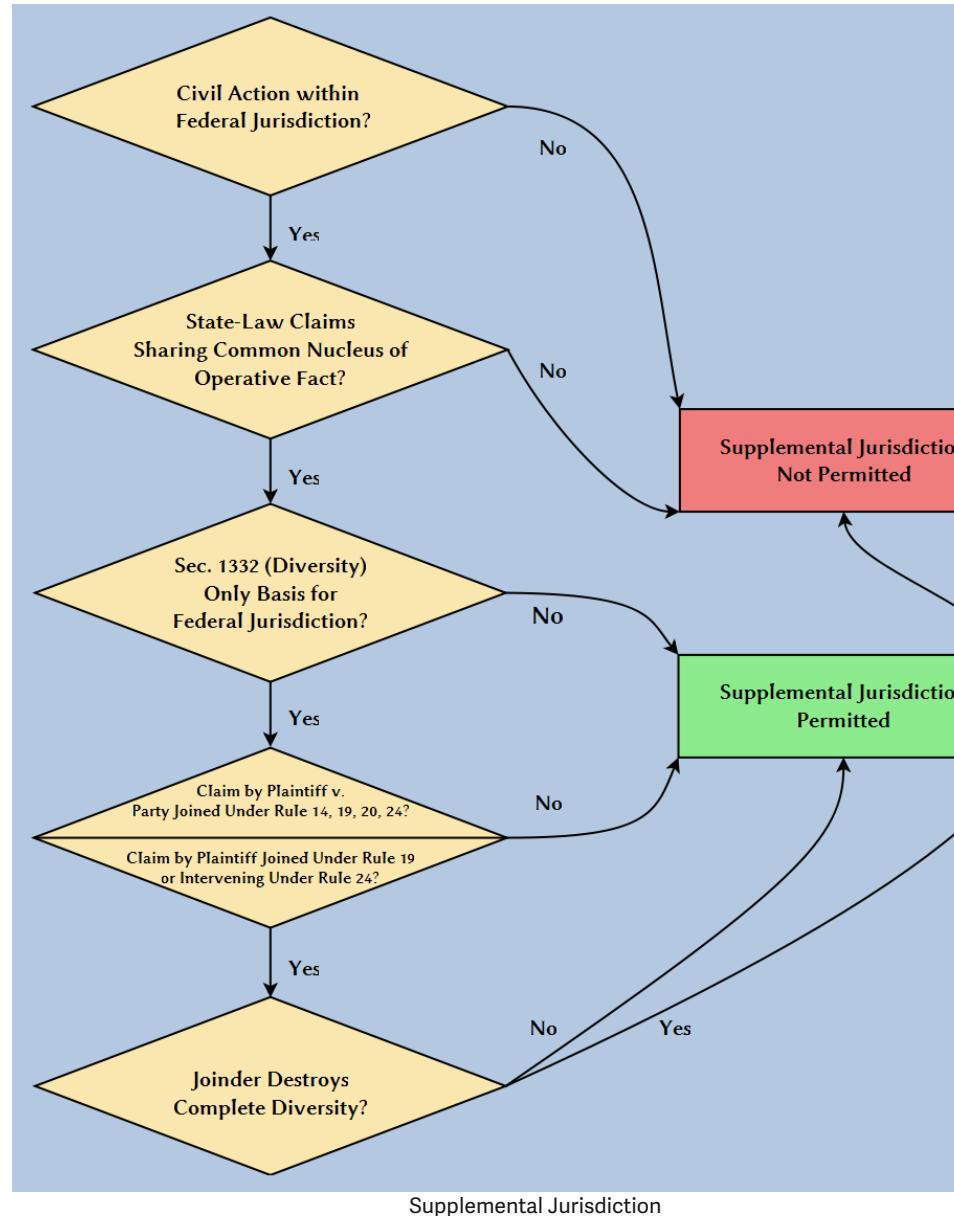

To the extent that the omission of Rule 20 plaintiffs from the list of § 1367(b) is indeed anomalous, moreover, it is no more anomalous than the inclusion of Rule 19 plaintiffs in the list would be if the alternative view of § 1367(a) were to prevail. If the district court has original jurisdiction over a civil diversity action where any plaintiff’s claims fail to comply requirements of § 1332, there is no need for a special § 1367(b) exception for Rule 19 plaintiffs who do not meet these requirements. Though the omission of Rule 20 plaintiffs from § 1367(b) presents something of a puzzle on our view of the statute, the inclusion of Rule 19 plaintiffs in this section is at least as difficult to explain under the alternative view.

And so we circle back to the original question. When the well-pleaded complaint in district court includes multiple claims, all part of the same case or controversy, and some, but not all, of the claims are within the court's original jurisdiction, does the court have before it "any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction"? It does. Under § 1367, the court has original jurisdiction over the civil action comprising the claims for which there is no jurisdictional defect. No other reading of § 1367 is plausible in light of the text and structure of the jurisdictional statute. Though the special nature and purpose of the diversity requirement mean that a single nondiverse party can contaminate every other claim in the lawsuit, the contamination does not occur with respect to jurisdictional defects that go only to the substantive importance of individual claims.

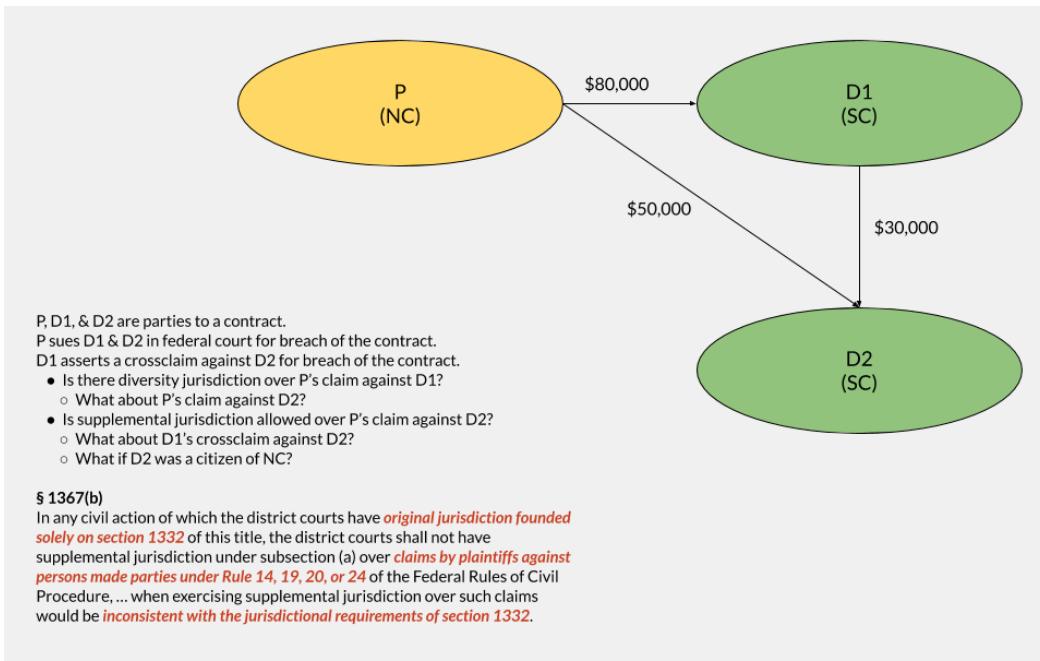

It follows from this conclusion that the threshold requirement of § 1367(a) is satisfied in cases, like those now before us, where some, but not all, of the plaintiffs in a diversity action allege a sufficient amount in controversy. We hold that § 1367 by its plain text overruled Clark and Zahn and authorized supplemental jurisdiction over all claims by diverse parties arising out of the same Article III case or controversy, subject only to enumerated exceptions not applicable in the cases now before us.

4. Removal Jurisdiction

28 U.S.C. § 1441

Removal of civil actions

- Except as otherwise expressly provided by Act of Congress, any civil action brought in a state court of which the district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction, may be removed by the defendant or the defendants, to the district court of the United States for the district embracing the place where such action is pending

- b. Any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction founded on a claim or right arising under the Constitution, treaties or law of the United States, shall be removable without regard to the citizenship or residence of the parties. Any other such action shall be removable only if none of the parties in interest properly joined and served as defendants is a citizen of the State in which such action is brought.

Procedure after removal generally

- a. In any case removed from a State court, the district court may issue all necessary orders and process to bring before it all proper parties whether served by process issued by the State court or otherwise.
- b. It may require the removing party to file with its clerk copies of all records and proceedings in such State court or may cause the same to be brought before it by writ of certiorari issued to such State court.
- c. A motion to remand the case on the basis of any defect other than lack of subject matter jurisdiction must be made within 30 days after the filing of the notice of removal under section 1446(a). If at any time before final judgment it appears that the district court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, the case shall be remanded. An order remanding the case may require payment of just costs and any actual expenses, including attorney fees, incurred as a result of the removal. A certified copy of the order of remand shall be mailed by the clerk to the clerk of the State court. The State court may thereupon proceed with such case.
- d. An order remanding a case to the State court from which it was removed is not reviewable on appeal or otherwise, except that an order remanding a case to the State court from which it was removed pursuant to section 1442 or 1443 of this title shall be reviewable by appeal or otherwise.
- e. If after removal the plaintiff seeks to join additional defendants whose joinder would destroy subject matter jurisdiction, the court may deny joinder, or permit joinder and remand the action to the State court.

Nonremovable actions

- (a) A civil action in any State court against a railroad or its receivers or trustees, arising under sections 1–4 and 5–10 of the Act of April 22, 1908 (45 U.S.C. 51–54, 55–60), may not be removed to any district court of the United States.
- (b) A civil action in any State court against a carrier or its receivers or trustees to recover damages for delay, loss, or injury of shipments, arising under section 11706 or 14706 of title 49, may not be removed to any district court of the United States unless the matter in controversy exceeds $10,000, exclusive of interest and costs.
- (c) A civil action in any State court arising under the workmen's compensation laws of such State may not be removed to any district court of the United States.
- (d) A civil action in any State court arising under section 40302 of the Violence Against Women Act of 1994 may not be removed to any district court of the United States.

Interestingly, of the four types of action that are not removable, three involve suits arising under federal statutes, 45 U.S.C. § 56; 49 U.S.C. § 11706(d)(1); 34 U.S.C. § 12361(e)(3). Those statutes expressly allow suits to be brought in either federal or state court. But, if the plaintiff opts to sue in state court, the defendant may not remove, even though the federal court would have original jurisdiction under § 1331.

In re Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000), the Supreme Court struck down section 40302 of the Violence Against Women Act, holding that Congress lacked constitutional authority to establish a federal cause of action for victims of crimes of violence motivated by gender.

5. Review Questions

Question 1

Peter, a lifelong resident of Pennsylvania, worked as a delivery driver in Peter Dreadful Express Corp. (DreadEx), which is incorporated and has its corporate offices in Pennsylvania. When Peter retired, he bought a second home in Florida, where he spends most of the year, returning to Pennsylvania for the summers. DreadEx owes Peter commissions earned during his final year of work. When the company fails to pay him, Peter sues DreadEx in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

Does the court have subject-matter jurisdiction?

Question 2

Pam, a lifelong resident of North Carolina, files a products liability action seeking damages against Danger Corp. in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina. Danger is incorporated in Delaware, has its sole manufacturing & distribution facility in North Carolina, and its corporate offices (where all significant business decisions are made) in North Carolina.

Does the court have subject-matter jurisdiction?

Question 3

Tri-State Landscaping, based in Johnson City, Tennessee, is organized as an unincorporated business partnership under Tennessee law. Of Tri-State's three partners, two are residents of Tennessee, the other a lifelong resident of North Carolina. The company provides residential and commercial landscaping services in eastern Tennessee, southeastern and northwestern North Carolina. Pat, a lifelong resident of Virginia, hires Tri-State to maintain the lawn and garden at her Abingdon, Virginia home. Dissatisfied with the work, Pat sues Tri-State for breach of contract, filing the action in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Virginia. As permitted under the applicable state law, Pat names Tri-State (and its individual partners) as the sole defendant.

Does the court have subject-matter jurisdiction?

Eleanor (domiciled in the state of Keystone) is employed by Bombco, Inc. (a munitions manufacturer) incorporated in Delaware with its sole place of business in New Jersey. Bombco sells most of its products to the U.S. Defense Department for use by the U.S. military.

During her first six months of work, Eleanor has been paid at the rate of $20/hour. She recently learned that a federal law, the Defense Contractor Wage Fairness Act (“DCWFA”), requires federal defense contractors to pay all employees at a rate no less than the “local prevailing wage” for employees in the same job classification under the U.S. Department of Labor’s “Standard Occupational Classification” (“SOC”) system. Eleanor believes that her job falls within the SOC classification for “Engineering Technicians”, for which the “local prevailing wage” under the DCWFA is $25/hour.

Believing that she has been underpaid, Eleanor decides to sue Bombco for $4800 (representing the alleged underpayment of $5/hour for the 960 hours she worked during the six month period). The DCWFA does not provide for a private right of action for employees who believe they have not been paid at the applicable prevailing wage rate. Instead, Eleanor asserts a claim under the state Wage Payment & Collection Law (“WPCL”), which provides that an employer must pay all wages earned by employees on regularly scheduled paydays. The WPCL also provides than an employee may bring a civil lawsuit to collect any unpaid wages. A plaintiff suing under the WPCL must allege and prove the following:

- The applicable rate of pay for the period subject to the suit,
- The total amount of wages earned during the same period, and
- The total amount of alleged underpayment during the same period.

The Keystone Supreme Court has held that a WPCL plaintiff may satisfy the first requirement by offering evidence of a wage rate imposed by state or federal law.

Bombco disputes Eleanor's wage claim on two grounds. First, Bombco contends that the Defense Contractor Wage Fairness Act does not apply to Eleanor's job. Second, Bombco contends that, even if the DCWFA does apply, the proper SOC classification for Eleanor's job is “Cutting Machine Operators, Metal & Plastic”, for which the local prevailing wage is only $20/hour.

Does a federal court have subject-matter jurisdiction over Eleanor's suit?

Chapter 5

Choice of Law in Federal Court

1. The Rules of Decision Act

28 U.S.C. § 1652

State laws as rules of decision

The laws of the several states, except where the Constitution or treaties of the United States or Acts of Congress otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in civil actions in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply.

1.1 “The Laws of the Several States”

The Rules of Decision Act applies to cases in which federal courts hear claims that arise under state law, i.e. under diversity jurisdiction. Federal courts must apply “the laws of the several states” as the “rules of decision” in such cases. By “rules of decision”, the statute means the substantive legal rules governing the claims, i.e. rules that define the rights, duties, and liabilities of the parties. But what does the statute mean by “laws of the several states”?

Swift v. Tyson, 41 U.S. 1 (1842)

Summary of Facts

The defendant, George Tysen purchased some land from Nathaniel Norton and Jairus Keith. As partial payment, Tyson gave Norton and Keith a bill of exchange. It turned out that, not only was the land virtually worthless, North and Keith did not actually own it. Before the bill of exchange came due, Norton signed it over to the plaintiff, John Swift, ostensibly in payment of a debt. Swift may have been in cahoots with Norton and Keith:

The circumstances surrounding the giving of the promissory note of Norton and Keith to Swift and the fact that after indorsing the bill to Swift the two erstwhile real estate salesmen disappeared, all hinted that Swift, Keith, and Norton had attempted to manufacture Swift's status as bona fide holder in order to allow him to collect the bill in spite of the hanky panky surrounding the land deal. Perhaps in return Swift gave Norton and Keith enough cash with which to make their escape.

xchange, a short-term negotiable instrument, is a signed, oral, written order binding one party to pay a fixed sum of money to another party on demand or at a determined date.” Wex Legal Swift then sought payment on the bill of exchange from Tyson, who refused on the ground that it was forged. Swift (a resident of Maine) sued Tyson (a resident of New York) in federal court, which had jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship.

Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the Court.

There is no doubt, that a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument for a valuable consideration, without any notice of facts which impeach its validity as between the antecedent parties, takes it under an endorsement made before the same becomes due, holds the title to it, by these facts, and may recover thereon, although as between the antecedent parties the transaction may be without any legal validity. This is a doctrine so long and so well established, and so essential to the security of negotiable paper, that it is laid up among the fundamental principles of the law, and requires no authority or reasoning to be now brought in its support. A question is there, that the holder of any negotiable paper, before it is due, is not bound to prove to a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, without notice; for the law will presume the absence of all rebutting proofs, and therefore it is incumbent upon the defendant to establish by way of defence satisfactory proofs of the contrary, and thus to overcome the presumption of the plaintiff.

In the present case, the plaintiff is a bona fide holder without notice for what the defendant gave him, a good and valid consideration, that is, for a pre-existing debt; and the only real question is, whether, under the circumstances of the present case, such a pre-existing debt constitutes a valuable consideration in the sense of the general rule applicable to negotiable instruments. We say, under the circumstances of the present case, for the acceptance of the instrument has been made in New York, the argument on behalf of the defendant is, that the instrument should be treated as a New York contract, and therefore to be governed by the laws of New York, as expounded by its Courts, as well upon general principles, as by the express provisions of the [Rules of Decision Act]. And then it is further contended, that by the law of New York, as expounded by its Courts, a pre-existing debt does not constitute, in the sense of the general rule, a valuable consideration applicable to negotiable instruments.

But, admitting the doctrine to be fully settled in New York, it remains to be considered, whether it is obligatory upon this Court, if it differs from the principles established in the commercial law. It is observable that the Courts of New York do not found their decision on this point upon any local statute, or positive, fixed, or ancient local usage: but they derive the doctrine from the general principles of commercial law. It is, however, contended, that the [Rules of Decision Act] furnishes a rule obligatory upon this Court to follow the decisions of the local tribunals in all cases to which they apply. That section provides "that the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the United States, in cases where they apply." In order to maintain the argument, it is necessary, therefore, to hold, that the word "laws," in this section, includes within the scope of the decisions of the local tribunals. In the ordinary use of language it will hardly that the decisions of Courts constitute laws. They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are; and are not of themselves laws. They are often re-examined, reversed, and qualified by the Courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective, or ill-founded, or otherwise incorrect. The laws of a state are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long established local customs having the force of laws. In all the various cases which have hitherto come before us for decision, this Court have uniformly supposed, that the true interpretation of the thirty-fourth section limited its application to state laws strictly local, that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It never has been supposed by us, that the section did apply, or was designed to apply, to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain upon general reasoning and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case. And we have not now the slightest difficulty in holding, that this section, upon its true intendment and construction, is strictly limited to local statutes and local usages of the character before stated, and does not extend to contracts and other instruments of a commercial nature, the true interpretation and effect whereof are to be sought, not in the decisions of the local tribunals, but in the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence. Undoubtedly, the decisions of the local tribunals upon such subjects are entitled to, and will receive, the most deliberate attention and respect of this Court; but they cannot furnish positive rules, or conclusive authority, by which our own judgments are to be bound up and governed. The law respecting negotiable instruments may be truly declared in the language of Cicero, to be in a great measure, not the law of a single country only, but of the commercial world. Non erit alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia posthac, sed et apud omnes gentes, et omni tempore, una eademque lex obtenebit.

It becomes necessary for us, therefore, upon the present occasion to express our own opinion of the true result of the commercial law upon the question now before us. And we have no hesitation in saying, that a pre-existing debt does constitute a valuable consideration in the sense of the general rule already stated, as applicable to negotiable instruments. Assuming it to be true, (which, however, may well admit of some doubt from the generality of the language,) that the holder of a negotiable instrument is unaffected with the equities between the antecedent parties, of which he has no notice, only where he receives it in the usual course of trade and business for a valuable consideration, before it becomes due; we are prepared to say, that receiving it in payment of, or as security for a pre-existing debt, is according to the known usual course of trade and business.

"There will not be different laws at Rome and at Athens, or different laws now and in the future, but one eternal and unchangeable law will be valid for all nations and all times".

Note: Swift and Its Discontents

^{11.} Cicero, On the Republic, Book III, § 22

Justice Story's opinion quotes the Roman statesman and philosopher Cicero for the proposition that law cannot differ from state to state. The cited passage ^[11] summarizes the natural law paradigm:

True law is right reason in agreement with nature; it is of universal application, unchanging and eternal. It is a sin to try to alter this law, nor is it allowable to attempt to repeal any part of it, and it is impossible to abolish it entirely. We cannot be freed from its obligations by senate or people, and we need not look for any other tribunal than the laws to decide our rights and wrongs. We are bound to obey it at all times, and there will not be different laws at Rome and at Athens, at one time, or at one place, and again at another; nor will there be different laws now and in the future, but one eternal and unchangeable law will be valid for all nations and all times, and there will be one master and ruler, that is, God, over us all, for he is the author of the law promulgator, and its enforcing judge. Whoever is disobedient is fleeing from himself and denying his own nature, and by reason of this very fact he will suffer the worst penalties, even if he escapes what is called considered punishment.

^{12.} A paradigm shift is a transformation in the fundamental assumptions, theories, and practice of a scientific or professional community. "When the transition is completed, the profession will have changed its view of the field, its methods, and its goals." Thomas S. Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, 84-85 (4th ed. 2012).

^{13.} See, e.g. George Rutherglen, International Shoe and the Legacy of Legal Realism, 2001 Supreme Court Review 347 (2001); Logan E. Sawyer III, Jurisdiction, Jurisprudence and Legal Change: Sociological Jurisprudence and the Road to International Shoe, 10 George Mason Law Review 39 (2001); David Marcus, The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Legal Realism as a Jurisprudence of Law Reform, 44 Georgia Law Review 433 (2009); William R. Casto, The Erie Doctrine and the Structure of Constitutional Revolutions, 62 Tulane Law Review 56 (1987).

During the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the legal field experienced a paradigm shift, ^[12] with methods associated with legal positivism, realism, and pragmatism challenging the previously dominant natural law and formalism. Cases like Erie and International Shoe, along with the adoption of the Federal Procedure, were significant moments in this jurisprudential revolution. ^[13]

Among those leading the charge was Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., whose work as a legal scholar and Supreme Court Justice advanced a positivist understanding of law and pragmatist approach to judicial decision making, and laid the groundwork for overturning Swift.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Common Law, 1-2 (1881):

The life of the law has not been logic: it has been experience. The felt necessities of the time, the moral and political theories, intuitions of public policy, avowed or unconscious, even the prejudices of judges share with their fellow-men, have had a good deal more to do than the syllogism in determining the rules by which men should be governed. The law embodies the story of a nation's development over many centuries, and it cannot be dealt with as if it contained only the axioms and corollaries of mathematics. In order to know what it is, we must know what it has been, and what it tends to become. We must alternately consult history and existing theories of legislation. But the most difficult labor of law is to understand the combination of the two into new products at every stage. The substance of the law at any given time pretty nearly corresponds, so far as it goes, with what is then understood to be convenient form and machinery, and the degree to which it is able to work out desired results, depend very much upon its past.

Southern Pacific Co. v. Jensen, 244 U.S. 205 (1917) (Holmes, J., dissenting):

The common law is not a brooding omnipresence in the sky but the articulate voice of some sovereign or quasi-sovereign that can be identified; although some decisions with which I have disagreed seem to have forgotten the fact. It always is the law of some State.

Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co., 215 US 349, 370-372 (1910) (Holmes, J., dissenting):

I admit that plenty of language can be found in the earlier cases to support the present decision. That is not surprising in view of the uncertainty and vacillation of the theory upon which Swift v. Tyson, and the extensions of its doctrine have proceeded. But I suppose it will be admitted on the other side that the independent jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts of the United States is a jurisdiction only to declare the law, least in a case like the present, and only to declare the law of the State. It is not an authority to make law. Swift v. Tyson was justified on the ground that that was all that the state courts did. But as has been pointed out, by a recent accomplished and able writer, that fiction had to be abandoned and was abandoned when this court came to decide the municipal bond cases, beginning with Gelpcke v. Dubuque. In those cases the court recognized the fact that decisions of state courts of last resort make law for the State. The principle is that a change of judicial decision after a contract has been made on the faith of an earlier one the other way is a change of the law.

The cases of the class to which I refer have not stood on the ground that this court agreed with the first decision, but on the ground that the state decision made the law for the State, and therefore should be given only a prospective operation when contracts had been entered into under the law as earlier declared. In various instances this court has changed its decision or rendered different decisions on similar facts arising in different States in order to conform to what is recognized as the local law.

Whether Swift v. Tyson can be reconciled with Gelpcke v. Dubuque, I do not care to enquire. I assume both cases to represent settled doctrines, whether reconcilable or not. But the moment you leave those principles which it is desirable to make uniform throughout the United States and which the decisions of this court tend to make uniform, obviously it is most undesirable for the courts of the United States to appear as interjecting an occasional arbitrary exception to a rule that in every other case prevails. I never yet have heard a statement of any reason justifying the power, and I find it hard to imagine one. I know of no authority in this court to say that in general state decisions shall make law only for the future. Judicial decisions have had retrospective operation for near a thousand years. It is said that we must exercise our independent judgment — but as to what? Surely as to the law of the States. Whence does that law issue? Certainly not from us. But it does issue and has been recognized by this court as issuing from the state courts as well as from the state legislatures. When we know what the source of the law has said that it shall be, our authority is at an end. The law of a State does not become something outside of the state court and independent of it by being called the common law. Whatever it is called it is the law as declared by the state judges and nothing else.

If, as I believe, my reasoning is correct, it justifies our stopping when we come to a kind of case that by nature and necessity is peculiarly local, and one as to which the latest intimations and indeed decisions of this court are wholly in accord with what I think to be sound law. To administer a different law is "to introduce into the jurisprudence of the State of Illinois the discordant elements of a substantial right which is protected in one set of courts and denied in the other, with no superior to decide which is right." It is admitted that we are bound by a settled course of decisions, irrespective of contract, because they make the law. I see no reason why we are less bound by a single one.

Black & White Taxicab Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab Co., 279 U.S. 518, 532-536 (1928) (Holmes, J., dissenting):

This is a suit brought by The Brown and Yellow Taxicab and Transfer Company, as plaintiff, to prevent The Black and White Taxicab and Transfer Company, from interfering with the carrying out of a contract between the plaintiff and the other defendant, The Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company. The Circuit Court of Appeals, affirming a decree of the District Court, granted an injunction and upheld this contract. It expressly recognized that the decisions of the Kentucky Courts held that in Kentucky a railroad company could not grant such rights, but this being a 'question of general law' it went its own way regardless of the Courts of this State.

The Circuit Court of Appeals had so considerable a tradition behind it in deciding as it did that if I did not regard the case as exceptional I should not feel warranted in presenting my own convictions again after having stated them in Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Company. But the question is important and in my opinion the prevailing doctrine has been accepted upon a subtle fallacy that never has been analyzed. If I am right the fallacy has resulted in an unconstitutional assumption of powers by the Courts of the United States which no lapse of time or respectable array of opinion should make us hesitate to correct. Therefore I think it proper to state what I think the fallacy is. — The often repeated proposition of this and the lower Courts is that the parties are entitled to an independent judgment on matters of general law. By that phrase is meant matters that are not governed by any law of the United States or by any statute of the State — matters that in States other than Louisiana are governed in most respects by what is called the common law. It is through this phrase that what I think the fallacy comes in.

Books written about any branch of the common law treat it as a unit, cite cases from this Court and Circuit Courts of Appeals, from the State Courts, from England and the Colonies of England indiscriminately and criticize them as right or wrong according to the writer's notions of a single theory. It is very hard to get away from this impression. It is true that there is one August Corpus, to understand which clearly is the only task of the student concerned. If there were such a transcendental body of law outside of any particular State but within it unless and until changed by statute, the Courts of the United States might be right in upholding an independent judgment as to what it was. But there is no such body of law. The fallacy and illusion which I think exist consist in supposing that there is this outside thing to be found. Law is a word used with many meanings, but law in the sense in which courts speak of it today does not exist without some authority behind it. The common law so far as it is enforced in a State, whether called common law or not, is not the common law generally but the law of that State existing by the authority of that State, with regard to what it may have been in England or anywhere else. It may be adopted by statute in place of a system previously in force. But a general adoption of it does not prevent the State Courts from refusing to follow the English decisions upon a matter where the local conditions are different. It may be changed by statute, as is done every day. It may be departed from deliberately by judicial decisions, as with water rights, in States where the common law generally prevails. Louisiana is a living proof that it need not be adopted at all. Whether and how far and in what sense a rule shall be adopted whether called common law or Kentucky law is for the State alone to decide.

If within the limits of the Constitution a State should declare one of the disputed rules of general law to be a statute there would be no doubt of the duty of all Courts to bow, whatever their private opinions might be. I see no reason why it should have less effect when it speaks by its other voice. If a state constitution should declare that on all matters of general law the decisions of the highest Court should establish the law, modified by statute or by a later decision of the same Court, I do not perceive how it would be possible for a Court of the United States to refuse to follow what the State Court decided in that domain. But if the constitution of a State establishes a Supreme Court it by implication does make that declaration, just as if it had said it in express words, so far as it is not interfered with by the superior power of the United States. The Supreme Court of a State does something more than make a scientific inquiry into a fact, it creates it and independent of it. It says, with an authority that no one denies, except when a citizen of another State is able to invoke an exceptional jurisdiction, that thus the law is and shall be. Whether it be said to make the law, declare the law, it deals with the law of the State with equal authority however its function may be. Mr. Justice Story in Swift v. Tyson, evidently under the tacit domination of the fallacy to which I have referred, devotes some energy to showing that the Rules of Decision Act refers only to statutes when it provides that "except as excepted the laws of the several States shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in Courts of the United States. An examination of the original document by a most competent authority has shown that Mr. Justice Story probably was wrong if anyone is interested to inquire what the instrument meant. 37 Harvard Law Review, 49, at pp. 81-88. But this question is deeper than the question of the authority by which certain particular acts, here the grant of exclusive privileges in coal mining stations, are governed. In my opinion the authority and only authority is the State, and if that be so, the law adopted by the State as its own should utter the last word. I should leave Swift v. Tyson undisturbed, as indicated in Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co., but I would not allow it to spread the assumed dominion over other fields.

In view of what I have said it is not necessary for me to give subordinate and narrower reasons for my holding that the decision below should be reversed. But there are adequate reasons short of what I think should be recognized. This is a question concerning the lawful use of land in Kentucky by a corporation incorporated by Kentucky. The policy of Kentucky with regard to it has been settled in Kentucky for more than a hundred years. Even under the rule that I combat, it has been recognized that a settled line of state decisions is conclusive to establish a rule of property or the public policy of the State. I should have supposed that arrangements could or could not be made for the use of a piece of land was a purely local question, and if on anything, the State should have its own way and the State Courts should be taken to declare the State wills.

Holmes stepped down from the Court in 1932 and died in 1935. Three years later, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Louis Brandeis (another important figure in legal pragmatism and realism) overturned Swift and adopted a positivist interpretation of the Rules of Decision Act.

Erie R.R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938)

Justice BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question for decision is whether the oft-challenged doctrine of Swift v. Tyson shall now be disapproved.

Tompkins, a citizen of Pennsylvania, was injured on a dark night by a passing freight train of the Erie Railroad Company while walking along its right of way at Hughestown in that State. He claimed that the accident occurred through negligence in the operation, or maintenance, of the train; that he was rightfully on the premises as licensee because on a commonly used beaten footpath which ran for a short distance alongside the tracks; and that he was struck by something which looked like a door projecting from one of the moving cars. To enforce that claim he brought an action in the federal court for southern New York, which had jurisdiction because the company is a corporation of that State. It denied liability; and the case was tried by a jury.

The Erie insisted that its duty to Tompkins was no greater than that owed to a trespasser. It contended, among other things, that its duty to Tompkins, and hence its liability, should be determined in accordance with the Pennsylvania law; that under the law of Pennsylvania, as declared by its highest court, persons who use pathways along the railroad right of way—that is a longitudinal pathway as distinguished from a crossing—are to be deemed trespassers; and that the railroad is not liable for injuries to undiscovered trespassers resulting from its negligence, unless it be wanton or wilful. Tompkins denied that any such rule had been established by the decisions of the Pennsylvania courts; and contended that, since there was no statute of the State on the subject, the railroad's duty and liability is to be determined in federal courts as a matter of general law.

The trial judge refused to rule that the applicable law precluded recovery. The jury brought in a verdict of $30,000; and the judgment entered thereon was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, which held that it was unnecessary to consider whether the law of Pennsylvania was as contended, because the question was one not of local, but of general, law and that "upon questions of general law the federal courts are free, in the absence of a local statute, to exercise their independent judgment as to what the law is; and it is well settled that the question of the responsibility of a railroad for injuries caused by its servants is one of general law. Where the public has made open and notorious use of a railroad right of way for a long period of time and without objection, the company owes to persons on such permissive pathway in the operation of its trains. It is likewise generally recognized law that a jury may find negligence exists toward a pedestrian using a permissive path on the railroad right of way hit by some object projecting from the side of the train."

The Erie had contended that application of the Pennsylvania rule was required, among other things, by the Rules of Decision Act, which provides:

The laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law or in equity, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply.

Because of the importance of the question whether the federal court was free to apply the alleged rule of the Pennsylvania common law, we granted certiorari.

First. Swift v. Tyson held that federal courts exercising jurisdiction on the ground of diversity of citizenship need not, in matters of general jurisprudence, apply the unwritten law of the State, as declared by its highest court; that they are free to exercise an independent judgment as to what the common law of the State is—or should be; and that, as there stated by Mr. Justice the true interpretation of the thirty-fourth section limited its application to state laws so far as they related to contracts, to the rights and titles to things movable by their nature, such as the right to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It was never has been supposed by us, that the section did apply, or was intended to apply, to contracts of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of the State, but having a permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals were called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain upon general principles and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is to be done in accordance with the principles of commercial law to govern the case.

The Court in applying the Rules of Decision Act to equity cases, in Mason v. United States, 14 U.S. 545, 559, said: "The statute, however, is merely declarative of the rule which would prevail in the absence of the statute." The federal courts assumed, in the broad field of "general law," that it was the duty of Congress to declare rules of decision which Congress was confessedly without power to enact. Doubt was repeatedly expressed as to the correctness of the construction given to the Rules of Decision Act, and as to the soundness of the rule which it introduced. But it was the duty of the research of a competent scholar, who examined the original document, which established that the construction given to it by the Court was erroneous; and that the purpose of the statute was merely to make certain that, in all matters except those in which some federal law is involved, the federal courts exercising jurisdiction in diversity of citizenship cases would apply the rules of decision the law of the State, unwritten as well as written. [14]

Criticism of the doctrine became widespread after the decision of Black & White Cab Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab Co., 276 U.S. 518 (1928). There, Brown and Yellow, a Kentucky company owned by Kentuckians, and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, also a Kentucky company, wished that the former should have the exclusive privilege of soliciting passenger transportation at the Bowling Green, Kentucky, railroad station; and that the Black & White a competing Kentucky corporation, should be prevented from interfering with that privilege. Knowing that such a contract would be void under the common law of Kentucky, it was arranged that the Brown and Yellow reincorporate under the law of Tennessee, and that the contract with the railroad should be executed there. The suit was then brought by the Tennessee corporation in the federal court for western Kentucky to enjoin competition by the Black and White; an injunction issued by the District Court was sustained by the Court of Appeals; and this Court, citing many decisions in which the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson had been applied, affirmed the decree.

Second. Experience in applying the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, had revealed its defects, political and social; and the benefits expected to flow from the rule did not accrue. Persistence of state courts in their own opinions on questions of common law prevented uniformity; and the impossibility of discovering a satisfactory line of demarcation between the province of general law and that of local law developed a new well of uncertainties.

On the other hand, the mischievous results of the doctrine had become apparent. Diversity of citizenship jurisdiction was conferred in order to prevent apprehended discrimination in state courts against those not citizens of the State. Swift v. Tyson introduced grave discrimination by non-citizens against citizens. It made rights enjoyed under the unwritten "general law" vary according to whether enforcement was sought in the state or in the federal court; and the privilege of selecting the court in which the right should be determined was conferred upon the non-citizen. Thus, the doctrine rendered impossible equal protection of the law. In attempting to promote uniformity of law throughout the United States, the doctrine had prevented uniformity in the administration of the law of the State.

The discrimination resulting became in practice far-reaching. This resulted in part from the broad province accorded to the so-called "general law" as to which federal courts exercised an independent judgment. In addition to questions of purely commercial law, "general law" was held to include the obligations under contracts entered into and to be performed within the State, the extent to which a carrier operating within a State may stipulate for exemption from liability for his own negligence or that of his employee; the liability for torts committed within the State upon persons resident or property located there, even where the question of liability depended upon the scope of a property right conferred by the State; and the right to exemplary or punitive damages. Furthermore, state decisions construing local deeds, mineral conveyances, and even devises of real estate were disregarded.

In part the discrimination resulted from the wide range of persons held entitled to avail themselves of the federal rule by resort to the diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. Through this jurisdiction individual citizens willing to remove from their own State and become citizens of another might avail themselves of the federal rule. And, without even change of residence, a corporate citizen of the State could avail itself of the federal rule by re-incorporating under the laws of another State, as was done in the Taxicab case.

The injustice and confusion incident to the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson have been urged as reasons for abolishing or limiting diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. Other relief has been proposed. If only a question of statutory construction were involved, no one would be prepared to abandon a doctrine so widely applied throughout nearly a century. The constitutional unconstitutionality of the course pursued has now been made clear and compels us to consider it.

Third. Except in matters governed by the Federal Constitution or by Acts of Congress, the law of the State in which a case is tried is the law to be applied in any case. And whether the law of the State shall be determined by its Legislature in a statute or by its highest court in a decision is not a matter of federal concern. There is no federal general common law. Congress has no power to declare substantive rules of common law applicable in a State whether they be local in their nature or "general" in character, such as commercial law or a part of the law of torts. And no clause in the Constitution purports to give such a power upon the federal courts. As stated by Mr. Justice Field when protesting against the decision in Ohio R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U.S. 368, 401, against ignoring the Ohio common law of forum non conveniens:

I am aware that what has been termed the general law of the country—which is often little more than what the judge advancing the doctrine thinks at the time should be the general law on a particular subject—has been often advanced in judicial opinions of this court to control a conflict of law of a State. I admit that learned judges have fallen into the habit of repeating this doctrine as a convenient mode of brushing aside the law of a State in conflict with their views. And I confess that, moved and governed by the authority of the great names of those judges, I have done many instances, unhesitatingly and confidently, but I think now erroneously, repeated this doctrine. But, notwithstanding the great names which may be cited in favor of the doctrine, notwithstanding the frequency with which the doctrine has been reiterated, there should be a perpetual protest against its repetition, the Constitution of the United States, which recognises and preserves the autonomy and independence of the States—indeed, in their legislative departments, independence in their judicial departments. Supervision over either the legislative or the executive action of the States is in no case permissible except as to matters by the Constitution specifically authorized or delegated to the United States. Any interference with either, except as thus authorised, is an invasion of the authority of the State and, to that extent, a denial of its independence.

The fallacy underlying the rule declared in Swift v. Tyson is made clear by Mr. Justice Field. The doctrine rests upon the assumption that there is "a transcendental body of law" which is binding upon any particular State but obligatory within it unless and until changed by statute. The federal courts have the power to use their judgment as to what the rules of common law are. In the federal courts "the parties are entitled to an independent judgment on matters of state law":

but law in the sense in which courts speak of it today does not exist without some definite body of law behind it. The common law so far as it is enforced in a State, whether called common law or state law, is not the common law generally but the law of that State existing by the authority of its Legislature, without regard to what it may have been in England or anywhere else. "the authority of the State is the State, and if that be so, the voice adopted by the State as its own [whether by its Legislature or of its Supreme Court] should utter the last word."

Thus the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, is, as Mr. Justice Holmes said, "an unconstitutional assumption of powers by courts of the United States which no lapse of time or respectable array of opinion should make us hesitate to correct." In disapproving that doctrine we do not hold unconstitutional § 34 of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789 or any other Act of Congress. We merely declare that in applying the doctrine this Court and the lower courts have invaded rights which in our opinion are reserved by the Constitution to the several States.

Fourth. The defendant contended that by the common law of Pennsylvania as declared by its highest court [* * *], the only duty owed to the plaintiff was to refrain from wilful or wanton injury. The plaintiff denied that such is the Pennsylvania law. In support of their respective contentions the parties discussed and cited many decisions of the Supreme Court of the State. The Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the question of liability is one of general law; and on that ground declined to decide the issue of state law. As we hold this was error, the judgment is reversed and the case remanded to it for further proceedings in conformity with our opinion.

Note on Erie

On remand, the Court of Appeals concluded that, "Under the Pennsylvania law, the defendant owed no duty to the plaintiff except to refrain from wanton or wilful injury." Because Tompkins neither alleged nor proved that the Railroad acted wantonly or wilfully, the case was remanded to the trial court with directions to enter judgment in favor of the Railroad. 98 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1938).

For a more detailed account of the incident (including photos of Tompkins before and after his unfortunate encounter with the train), see Bryan Frye, "The Ballad of Harry Tompkins".

1.2 Substance and Procedure under Erie

The underlying issue in Erie was one of substantive law: the standard of care that the Railroad owed Tompkins. In a concurring opinion, Justice Reed suggested that on matters of procedure, federal courts were not bound to follow state law:

The line between procedural and substantive law is hazy but no one doubts federal power over procedure. The Judiciary Article and the "necessary and proper" clause of Article One may fully authorize legislation, such as this section of the Judiciary Act.

In the aftermath of Erie, the Court sought to provide an answer to the question of how to draw the line between substance and procedure.

Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. York, 326 U.S. 99 (1945)

^{15.} “The term ‘equity’ refers to a particular set of remedies and associated procedures involved with civil law. These equitable doctrines and procedures are distinguished from ‘legal’ ones. While legal remedies typically involve monetary damages, equitable relief typically refers to injunctions, specific performance, or vacatur. A court will usually award equitable remedies when a legal remedy is insufficient or inadequate.” Wex Legal Dictionary The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure eliminated the procedural distinction between “law” and “equity” suits, and most state judicial systems have followed suit.

York sued Guaranty Trust for breach of fiduciary duty. The issue was whether, “in a suit brought on the basis of a federal statute of limitations, if the cause of action accrued in the courts of a State where the federal court is sitting even though the exclusive basis of federal jurisdiction is diversity of citizenship.” If so, the suit would be dismissed as untimely. This turned on whether application of the statute of limitations to bar “a claim created by the States is a matter of ‘substantive rights’ to be resolved by the federal court of equity when that court’s jurisdiction is dependent on the fact that there is a State-created right, such statute of ‘a mere remedial character, which a federal court may disregard?’”

Rather than mechanically applying the labels “substance” and “procedure”, the Court took a pragmatic approach focused on whether application of a different rule would yield a different outcome.

Here we are dealing with a right to recover derived not from the United States but from one of the States. When, because the plaintiff happens to be a non-resident, such a right is enforceable in a federal as well as in a State court, the forms and mode of enforcing the right may at times, naturally enough, vary because the two judicial systems are not identical. But since a federal court adjudicating a State-created right solely on account of the diversity of citizenship of the parties is for that purpose, in effect, only another court of the State, it cannot afford recovery if the right to recover is made unavailable by the State nor can it substantially affect the enforcement of the right as given by the State.

And so the question is not whether a statute of limitations is deemed a matter of “procedure” in so far as it concerns the manner and the means by which a right to recover, as recognized by the State, is enforced, or whether such statutory limitation is a matter of substance in the aspect that alone is relevant to our problem, namely, does it significantly affect the result of a suit for a federal court to disregard a law of a State that would be controlling in an action upon the same cause of action by the same parties in a State court?

It is therefore immaterial whether statutes of limitation are characterized either as “substantive” or “procedural” in State court opinions in any use of those terms unrelated to the specific issue before us. Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins was not an endeavor to formulate scientific legal terminology. It expressed a policy that touches vitally the proper distribution of judicial power between State and federal courts. In essence, the intent of that decision was to insure that, in all cases where a federal court is exercising jurisdiction over a cause of action, because of the diversity of citizenship of the parties, the outcome of the litigation in the federal court will be substantially the same, so far as legal rules determine the outcome of a litigation, as it would be if it were tried in a State court. The nub of the policy that underlies Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins is that for the same transaction, the accident of a suit by a non-resident litigant in a federal court instead of in a State court a block away, should not lead to a substantially different result.

Plainly enough, a statute that would completely bar recovery in a suit if brought in a State court would bar the State-created right vitally and not merely formally or negligibly. As to consequences that so intimately affect recovery or non-recovery a federal court in a diversity case should follow State law.

Ragan v. Merchants Transfer & Warehouse Co., 337 U.S. 537 (1949)

Ragan sued Merchants Transfer for injuries resulting from a traffic accident. A two-year statute of limitations under state law applied. The plaintiff filed the complaint in federal court less than two years after the accident, but did not serve the complaint on the defendant until more than two years had passed. Relying on Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 3 ("A civil action is commenced by filing a complaint with the court."), the plaintiff argued that filing the complaint was sufficient to satisfy the statute of limitations. The defendant argued that the federal court must follow state law, under which the statute of limitations was not satisfied unless the suit was both filed and served within the allotted time.

As in Guaranty Trust, the Court focused on whether applying different rules in state and federal court would yield different outcomes. Once again, the Court held that the federal court must follow state law, under which the plaintiff's right to relief would be extinguished.

Woods v. Interstate Realty, 337 U.S. 535 (1949) and Cohen v. Beneficial Indust. Loan Corp, 337 U.S. 541 (1949)

In these two cases, decided together with Ragan, the Court likewise held that the federal court must apply state law rules where a contrary federal rule would have yielded different outcomes. Woods v. Interstate Realty (State rule, barring unqualified business from appearing in state court, applies in federal diversity action); Cohen v. Beneficial Indust. Loan Corp, (State rule, requiring bond in shareholder derivative suit, applies in federal diversity action, despite lack of bond requirement in FRCP Rule 23.1).

Byrd v. Blue Ridge Rural Electric Cooperative, Inc., 356 U.S. 525 (1958)

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case was brought in the District Court for the Western District of South Carolina. Jurisdiction was based on diversity of citizenship. 28 U. S. C. § 1332. The petitioner, a resident of North Carolina, sued respondent, a South Carolina corporation, for damages for injuries allegedly caused by the respondent's negligence. He had judgment on a jury verdict. The Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit reversed and directed the entry of judgment for the respondent. We granted certiorari and subsequently ordered reargument.

The respondent is in the business of selling electric power to subscribers in rural sections of South Carolina. The petitioner was employed as a lineman in the construction crew of a construction contractor. The contractor, R. H. Bouligny, Inc., held a contract with the respondent in the amount of $334,300 for the building of some 24 miles of new power lines, the reconversion to higher capacities of about 88 miles of existing lines, and the construction of 2 new substations and a breaker station. The petitioner was injured while connecting power lines to one of the new substations.

One of respondent's affirmative defenses was that, under the South Carolina Workmen's Compensation Act, the petitioner—because the work contracted to be done by his employer was work of the kind also done by the respondent's own construction and maintenance crews—had the status of a statutory employee of the respondent and was therefore barred from suing the respondent at law because obliged to accept statutory compensation benefits as remedy for his injuries. Two questions concerning this defense are before us: (1) Court of Appeals erred in directing judgment for respondent without a remand to give an opportunity to introduce further evidence; and (2) whether petitioner, notwithstanding, is entitled to a jury determination of the factual issues raised by the trial court.

I.

The Supreme Court of South Carolina has held that there is no particular form to determine whether an owner is a statutory employer under [the South Carolina compensation statute]:

while the language of the statute is plain and unambiguous, there are so many different situations which may arise that no easily applied formula can be laid down for the determination of all cases. In other words, ‘it is often a matter of extreme difficulty to decide whether a given case falls within the designation of the statute. It is in each case largely a question of fact.’

[The trial judge concluded, based on his interpretation of the South Carolina statute and the evidence presented, that Byrd was not a statutory employee of Blue Ridge and thus denied Blue Ridge’s motion to dismiss based on the workers’ compensation bar.]

The Court of Appeals disagreed with the District Court’s construction of [the statute]. In view of the decisions of the Supreme Court of South Carolina, the Court of Appeals held that the trial court had granted respondent immunity from the action if the proofs established that the respondent’s own crews had constructed lines and substations which, like the work contracted by the petitioner’s employer, were necessary for the distribution of the electric power. We believe that the Court of Appeals erred in holding that the petitioner was in the business of selling. We ordinarily accept the interpretation of the trial court by the Court of Appeals, and do so readily here since neither party now disputes the interpretation of the statute.

However, instead of ordering a new trial at which the petitioner might offer his own evidence, pertinent to a determination according to the correct interpretation, the Court of Appeals rejected its own determination on the record and directed a judgment for the respondent.

While the matter is not adverted to in the court’s opinion, implicit in the direction of the holding that the petitioner, although having no occasion to do so under the District Court’s interpretation of the statute, was not entitled to an opportunity to present his respondent’s case under the correct interpretation.

We believe that the Court of Appeals erred. The petitioner is entitled to have his case determined in the trial court. This would be necessary even if petitioner offered his own. Although the respondent’s evidence was sufficient to withstand the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the meaning given the statute by the Court of Appeals, it presented a fact question, which the circumstances of this case is properly to be decided by a jury. the jury or the trial court—consistent with the view of the South Carolina cases that this question is largely one of degree and of fact—might reasonably reach an opposite conclusion from that reached by the Court of Appeals as to the ultimate fact whether the respondent was a statutory employer.

At all events, the petitioner is plainly entitled to have an opportunity to try the issue under the Court of Appeals' interpretation.

II.

A question is also presented as to whether on remand the factual issue is to be decided by the judge or by the jury. The respondent argues on the basis of the decision of the Supreme Court of South Carolina in Adams v. Davison-Paxon Co. that the issue of immunity should be decided by the judge and not by the jury. That was a negligence action brought in the state trial court against a store owner by an employee of an independent contractor who operated the store's millinery department. The trial judge denied the store owner's motion for a directed verdict made upon the ground that [the workers' compensation statute] barred the plaintiff's action. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The South Carolina Supreme Court reversed, holding that it was for the judge and not the jury to decide on the evidence whether the owner was a statutory employer, and that the store owner had sustained his defense. The court rested its holding on decisions involving judicial review of the Industrial Commission.

The respondent argues that this state-court decision governs the present diversity case and "divests the jury of its normal function" to decide the disputed fact question of the respondent's immunity under [the workers' compensation statute]. This is to contend that the federal court is bound under Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins to follow the state court's holding to secure uniform enforcement of the immunity created by the State.

First. It was decided in Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins that the federal courts in diversity cases must respect the definition of state-created rights and obligations by the state courts. We must, therefore, first examine the rule in Adams v. Davison-Paxon Co. to determine whether it is bound up with these rights and obligations in such a way that its application in the federal court is required.

The Workmen's Compensation Act is administered in South Carolina by its Industrial Commission. The South Carolina courts hold that, on judicial review of actions of the Commission under [the Act], the question whether the claim of an injured workman is within the Commission's jurisdiction is a matter of law for decision by the court, which makes its own findings of fact relating to that jurisdiction. The South Carolina Supreme Court states no reasons in Adams v. Davison-Paxon Co. why, although the jury decides all other factual issues raised by the cause of action and defenses, the jury is displaced as to the factual issue raised by the affirmative defense under [the workers' compensation statute]. The decisions cited to support the holding are concerned solely with defining the scope and method of judicial review of the Industrial Commission. A State may, of course, distribute the functions of its judicial machinery as it sees fit. The decisions relied upon, however, furnish no reason for selecting the judge rather than the jury to decide this single affirmative defense in the negligence action. They simply reflect a policy that administrative determination of "jurisdictional facts" should not be final but subject to judicial review. The conclusion is inescapable that the Adams holding is grounded in the practical consideration that the question had therefore come before the South Carolina courts from the Industrial Commission and the courts had become accustomed to deciding the factual issue of immunity without the aid of juries. We find nothing to suggest that the state requirement was announced as an integral part of the special relationship created by the statute. The requirement appears to be merely a form and mode of enforcing the immunity, and it is intended to be bound up with the definition of the rights and obligations of the parties.

Second. But cases following Erie have evinced a broader policy to the effect that the federal court should conform as near as may be—in the absence of other considerations—to state law of form and mode where the state rules may bear substantially on the question. The litigation would come out one way in the federal court and another way in the state court if the federal court failed to apply a particular local rule. Concededly the nature of the trial which tries issues may be important in the enforcement of the parcel of rights making up the cause of action or defense, and bear significantly upon achievement of uniform enforcement of the right. It may well be that in the instant personal-injury case the outcome would be affected by whether the issue of immunity is decided by a judge or a jury. That being so, "outcome" the only consideration, a strong case might appear for saying that the federal court should follow the state practice.

But there are affirmative countervailing considerations at work here. The federal system is an independent system for administering justice to litigants who properly invoke its jurisdiction. An essential characteristic of that system is the manner in which, in civil common law cases, it distributes trial functions between judge and jury and, under the influence of the command—the command—of the Seventh Amendment, assigns the decisions of disputed questions to the jury. The policy of uniform enforcement of state-created rights and obligations requires in every case exact compliance with a state rule—not bound up with rights and obligations. Such a rule disrupts the federal system of allocating functions between judge and jury. Thus the question here is whether the federal policy favoring jury decisions of disputed fact questions should give way to the state rule in the interest of furthering the objective that the litigation should come out one way in the federal court and another way in the state court.

We think that in the circumstances of this case the federal court should not follow the state rule. It cannot be gainsaid that there is a strong federal policy against allowing state rules to interfere with the judge-jury relationship in the federal courts. In Herron v. Southern Pacific Co. (1931), the trial judge in a personal-injury negligence action brought in the District Court of Arizona on diversity grounds directed a verdict for the defendant when it appeared that the law required the plaintiff to prove the defendant's negligence and that he had done so. The trial judge refused to do so because of a provision of the Arizona Constitution which made the jury the sole arbiter of the question of contributory negligence. This Court sustained the action of the trial judge, holding that "federal laws cannot alter the essential character or function of a federal court" because the function "is not in any sense a local matter, and state statutes which would interfere with the performance of that function are not binding upon the federal court under either the 'Diversity of Citizenship' Act or the 'rules of decision' Act." Perhaps even more clearly in light of the influence of the Seventh Amendment, the function assigned to the jury "is an essential factor in the trial for which the Federal Constitution provides." Concededly the Herron case was decided under Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, but even when Swift v. Tyson was governing law and all the courts sitting in diversity cases to disregard state decisional law, it was never thought that state statutes or constitutions were similarly to be disregarded. Yet Herron held that state statutes and constitutional provisions could not disrupt or alter the essential character or function of a federal court.

Third. We have discussed the problem upon the assumption that the outcome of the litigation may be substantially affected by whether the issue of immunity is decided by a judge or a jury. But clearly there is not present here the certainty that a different result would follow, or even the strong possibility that this would be the case. There are factors present here which might reduce that possibility. The trial judge in the federal system has powers denied the judges of many States to comment on the weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses, and discretion to grant a new trial if the verdict appears to him to be against the weight of the evidence. We do not think the likelihood of a different result is so strong as to require the federal practice of jury determination of disputed factual issues to yield to the state rule in the interest of uniformity of outcome.

2. The Rules Enabling Act

Rule-making power generally

(a) The Supreme Court and all courts established by Act of Congress may from time to time prescribe rules for the conduct of their business. Such rules shall be consistent with Acts of Congress and rules of practice and procedure prescribed under section 2072 of this title.

(b) Any rule prescribed by a court, other than the Supreme Court, under subsection (a) shall be prescribed only after giving appropriate public notice and an opportunity for comment. Such rule shall take effect upon the date specified by the prescribing court and shall have such effect on pending proceedings as the prescribing court may order.

(1) A rule of a district court prescribed under subsection (a) shall remain in effect unless modified or abrogated by the judicial council of the relevant circuit.

(2) Any other rule prescribed by a court other than the Supreme Court under subsection (a) shall remain in effect unless modified or abrogated by the Judicial Conference.

(d) Copies of rules prescribed under subsection (a) by a district court shall be furnished to the judicial council, and copies of all rules prescribed by a court other than the Supreme Court under subsection (a) shall be furnished to the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and made available to the public.

(e) If the prescribing court determines that there is an immediate need for a rule, such court shall proceed under this section without public notice and opportunity for comment, but shall promptly thereafter afford such notice and opportunity for comment.

(f) No rule may be prescribed by a district court other than under this section.

28 U.S.C. § 2072

Rules of procedure and evidence; power to prescribe

(a) The Supreme Court shall have the power to prescribe general rules of practice and rules of evidence for cases in the United States district courts (including proceedings before magistrate judges thereof) and courts of appeals.

(b) Such rules shall not abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right. All laws inconsistent with such rules shall be of no further force or effect after such rules have taken effect.

(c) Such rules may define when a ruling of a district court is final for the purpose of appeal under section 1291 of this title.

28 U.S.C. § 2073

Rules of procedure and evidence; method of prescribing

(1) The Judicial Conference shall prescribe and publish the procedures for the consideration of proposed rules under this section.

(2) The Judicial Conference may authorize the appointment of committees of the Judicial Conference by recommending rules to be prescribed under sections 2072 and 2073. Each such committee shall consist of members of the bench and the profession, including trial and appellate judges.

(b) The Judicial Conference shall authorize the appointment of a standing committee to consider practice, procedure, and evidence under subsection (a) of this section. Such standing committee shall review each recommendation of any other committees so appointed and recommend to the Judicial Conference rules of practice, procedure, and evidence and such changes proposed by a committee appointed under subsection (a)(2) of this section as may be necessary to maintain consistency and otherwise promote the interest of justice.

(1) Each meeting for the transaction of business under this chapter by any committee appointed under this section shall be open to the public, except when the committee, in open session and with a majority present, determines that it is in the interest that all or part of the remainder of the meeting on that day shall be closed.

public, and states the reason for so closing the meeting. Minutes of each meeting for the transaction of business under this chapter shall be maintained by the committee and made available to the public, except that any portion of such minutes, relating to a closed meeting and made available to the public, may contain such deletions as may be necessary to avoid frustrating the purposes of closing the meeting.

(2) Any meeting for the transaction of business under this chapter, by a committee appointed under this section, shall be preceded by sufficient notice to enable all interested persons to attend.

(d) In making a recommendation under this section or under section 2072 or 2075, the body making that recommendation shall provide a proposed rule, an explanatory note on the rule, and a written report explaining the body's action, including any minority or other separate views.

(e) Failure to comply with this section does not invalidate a rule prescribed under section 2072 or 2075 of this title.

Rules of procedure and evidence; submission to Congress; effective date

(a) The Supreme Court shall transmit to the Congress not later than May 1 of the year in which a rule prescribed under section 2072 is to become effective a copy of the proposed rule. Such rule shall take effect no earlier than December 1 of the year in which such rule is so transmitted unless otherwise provided by law. The Supreme Court may fix the extent such rule shall apply to proceedings then pending, except that the Supreme Court shall not require the application of such rule to further proceedings then pending to the extent that, in the opinion of the court in which such proceedings are pending, the application of such rule in such proceedings would not be feasible or would work injustice, in which event the former rule applies.

(b) Any such rule creating, abolishing, or modifying an evidentiary privilege shall have no force or effect unless approved by Act of Congress.

Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460 (1965)

Chief Justice WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question to be decided is whether, in a civil action where the jurisdiction of the United States district court is based upon diversity of citizenship between the parties, service of process shall be made in the manner prescribed by state law or that set forth in Rule 4(d)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

On February 6, 1963, petitioner, a citizen of Ohio, filed her complaint in the District District of Massachusetts, claiming damages in excess of $10,000 for personal injury from an automobile accident in South Carolina, allegedly caused by the negligence of Plumer Osgood, a Massachusetts citizen deceased at the time of the filing of the suit. Respondent, Mrs. Osgood's executor and also a Massachusetts citizen, was named as defendant. On February 8, service was made by leaving copies of the summons and the complaint with the respondent's wife at his residence, concededly in compliance with Rule 4(d)(1), which provides:

The summons and complaint shall be served together. The plaintiff shall furnish the person served with such copies as are necessary. Service shall be made as follows:

- I. Upon an individual other than an infant or an incompetent person, by delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint to him personally or by leaving copies thereof at his dwelling house or usual place of abode with some person of suitable age and discretion then residing there.

Respondent filed his answer on February 26, alleging, inter alia, that the action should be dismissed because it had been brought "contrary to and in violation of the provisions of section 9 of chapter 197 of the Massachusetts General Laws (Ter. Ed.) Chapter 197, Section 9." That section provides:

Except as provided in this chapter, an executor or administrator shall not be held to answer to any action by a creditor of the deceased which is not commenced within one year from the date of giving bond for the performance of his trust, or to such an action which is commenced more than one year unless before the expiration thereof the writ in such action has been served by delivery upon such executor or administrator or service thereof accepted by him or a notice stating the name of the estate, the name and address of the creditor, the amount of the claim and the cause why the action has been brought has been filed in the proper registry of probate.

On October 17, 1963, the District Court granted respondent's motion for summary judgment, citing Ragan v. Merchants Transfer Co., 337 U.S. 530, and Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, 334 U.S. 125, in support of its conclusion that the adequacy of the service was to be measured by § 9 of the statute. The court held, however, that petitioner had not complied. On appeal, petitioner admitted noncompliance with § 9, but argued that Rule 4(d)(1) defines the method by which service of process is to be made in diversity actions. The Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, finding that "[r]elatively minor amendments [to § 9] evince a clear legislative purpose to require personal notification within one year," concluded that the conflict of state and federal rules was over "a substantive procedural matter," and unanimously affirmed. Because of the threat to the goal of uniform federal procedure posed by the decision below, we granted certiorari.

We conclude that the adoption of Rule 4(d)(1), designed to control service of process in diversity actions, neither exceeded the congressional mandate embodied in the Rules Enabling Act nor transgressed constitutional bounds, and that the Rule is therefore the standard against which the District Court should have measured the adequacy of the service. Accordingly, we reverse the decision of the Court of Appeals.

The Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2072, provides, in pertinent part:

The Supreme Court shall have the power to prescribe, by general rules, the forms of process, pleadings, and motions, and the practice and procedure of the district courts of the United States in civil actions.

Such rules shall not abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right and shall preserve the right of trial by jury.

Under the cases construing the scope of the Enabling Act, Rule 4(d)(1) clearly passes muster. Prescribing the manner in which a defendant is to be notified that a suit has been instituted against him, it relates to the “practice and procedure of the district courts.”

The test must be whether a rule really regulates procedure,—the judicial process for enforcing rights and duties recognized by substantive law and for justly administering remedy and redress for disregard or infraction of them.

Sibbach v. Wilson & Co., 312 U. S. 1, 14.

In Mississippi Pub. Corp. v. Murphree, 326 U. S. 438, this Court upheld Rule 4(f), which permits service of a summons anywhere within the State (and not merely the district) in which a district court sits:

We think that Rule 4(f) is in harmony with the Enabling Act. Undoubtedly most alterations of the rules of practice and procedure may and often do affect the rights of litigants. Congress' prohibition of any alteration of substantive rights of litigants was obviously not addressed to such incidental effects as necessarily attend the adoption of the prescribed new rules of procedure upon the rights of litigants who, agreeably to rules of practice and procedure, have been brought before a court authorized to determine their rights. Sibbach v. Wilson & Co. The fact that the application of Rule 4(f) will operate to subject petitioner's rights to adjudication by the district court for northern Mississippi will undoubtedly affect those rights. But it does not operate to abridge, enlarge or modify the rules of decision by which that court will adjudicate its rights.

Thus were there no conflicting state procedure, Rule 4(d)(1) would clearly control. However, respondent, focusing on the contrary Massachusetts rule, calls to the Court's attention another line of cases, a line which—like the Federal Rules—had its birth in 1938. Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins held that federal courts sitting in diversity cases, when deciding questions of “substantive” law, are bound by state court decisions as well as state statutes. The broad command of Erie was therefore identical to that of the Enabling Act: federal courts are to apply state substantive law and federal procedural law. However, as subsequent cases sharpened the distinction between substance and procedure, the line of cases following Erie diverged markedly from the line construing the Enabling Act. Guaranty Trust Co. v. York made it clear that Erie-type problems were not to be solved by reference to any traditional or common-sense substance-procedure distinction:

And so the question is not whether a statute of limitations is deemed a matter of ‘procedure’ in some sense. The question is does it significantly affect the result of a litigation for a federal court to disregard a law of a State that would be controlling in an action upon the same claim by the same parties in a State court?

Respondent, by placing primary reliance on York and Ragan, suggests that the Erie doctrine acts as a check on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, that despite the clear command of Rule 4(d)(1), Erie and its progeny demand the application of the Massachusetts rule. Reduced to essentials, the argument is: (1) Erie, as refined in York, demands that federal courts apply state law whenever application of federal law in its stead will alter the outcome of the case. (2) In this case, a determination that the Massachusetts service requirements obtain will result in immediate victory for respondent. If, on the other hand, it should be held that Rule 4(d)(1) the litigation will continue, with possible victory for petitioner. (3) Therefore, application of the Massachusetts rule. The syllogism possesses an appealing simplicity, but several reasons invalid.

In the first place, it is doubtful that, even if there were no Federal Rule making it difficult to serve process by substituted service, the Erie rule would have obliged the Court to follow the Massachusetts procedure. "Outcome-determination" analysis was intended to serve as a talisman. Indeed, the message of York itself is that choices between state and federal law are to be made not by application of any automatic, "litmus paper" test, but rather by reference to the policies underlying the Erie rule.

The Erie rule is rooted in part in a realization that it would be unfair for the character of a litigation materially to differ because the suit had been brought in a federal court.

Diversity of citizenship jurisdiction was conferred in order to prevent apprehended discrimination in state courts against those not citizens of the State. Swift v. Tyson introduced grave discrimination by non-citizens against citizens. It made rights enjoyed under the unwritten 'general law' depend upon whether enforcement was sought in the state or in the federal court; and the right of selecting the court in which the right should be determined was conferred upon the parties. Thus, the doctrine rendered impossible equal protection of the law."

The decision was also in part a reaction to the practice of "forum-shopping" which sprang up in response to the rule of Swift v. Tyson. That the York test was an attempt to efface the distinction in policies is demonstrated by the fact that the opinion framed the inquiry in terms of variations between state and federal litigation. Not only are nonsubstantial, or trivial, variations not likely to raise the sort of equal protection problems which troubled the Court, but they are also unlikely to influence the choice of a forum. The "outcome-determination" test cannot be read without reference to the twin aims of the Erie rule: discouragement of forum shopping and avoidance of inequitable administration of the laws.

The difference between the conclusion that the Massachusetts rule is applicable and the conclusion that it is not, is of course at this point "outcome-determinative" in the sense that if we hold the state rule to apply, respondent prevails, whereas if we hold that Rule 4(d)(1) applies, the litigation will continue. But in this sense every procedural variation is "outcome-determinative". For example, having brought suit in a federal court, a plaintiff cannot then insist that he may file subsequent pleadings in accord with the time limits applicable in the state, since though enforcement of the federal timetable will, if he continues to insist that he may do so, result in the state time limit, result in determination of the controversy against him. So it is that the choice of the federal or state rule will at this point have a marked effect upon the outcome of the litigation, the difference between the two rules would be of scant, if any, significance in the choice of a forum. Petitioner, in choosing her forum, was not presented with a situation where application of the state rule would wholly bar recovery; rather, adherence to the state rule would have resulted only in altering the way in which process was served. It is difficult to argue that permitting service of defendant's wife to take the place of service of defendant himself alters the mode of enforcement of state-created rights sufficiently "substantial" to raise the sort of equal protection problems to which the opinion alluded.

^{16.} (n.11 in opinion) We cannot seriously entertain the thought that one suing an estate would be led to choose the federal court because of a belief that adherence to Rule 4(d)(1) is less likely to give the executor actual notice than § 9, and therefore more likely to produce a default judgment. Rule 4(d)(1) is well designed to give actual notice, as it did in this case.

There is, however, a more fundamental flaw in respondent's syllogism: the incorrect assumption that the rule of Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins constitutes the appropriate test of the validity and therefore the applicability of a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure. The Erie rule has never been invoked to void a Federal Rule. It is true that there have been cases where this Court has held applicable a state rule in the face of an argument that the situation was governed by one of the Federal Rules. But the holding of each such case was not that Erie commanded displacement of a Federal Rule by an inconsistent state rule, but rather that the scope of the Federal Rule was not as broad as the losing party urged, and therefore, there being no Federal Rule which covered the point in dispute, Erie commanded the enforcement of state law.

Respondent contends, in the first place, that the charge was correct because of the fact that Rule 8(c) of the Rules of Civil Procedure makes contributory negligence an affirmative defense. We do not agree. Rule 8(c) covers only the manner of pleading. The question of the burden of establishing contributory negligence is a question of local law which federal courts in diversity of citizenship cases must apply.

(Here, of course, the clash is unavoidable; Rule 4(d)(1) says—implicitly, but with unmistakable clarity—that in-hand service is not required in federal courts.) At the same time, in cases adjudicating the validity of Federal Rules, we have not applied the York rule or other refinements of Erie, but have to this day continued to decide questions concerning the scope of the Enabling Act and the constitutionality of specific Federal Rules in light of the distinction set forth in Sibbach.

Nor has the development of two separate lines of cases been inadvertent. The line between "substance" and "procedure" shifts as the legal context changes. "Each implies different variables depending upon the particular problem for which it is used." Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, supra, at 108. It is true that both the Enabling Act and the Erie rule say, roughly, that federal courts are to apply state "substantive" law and federal "procedural" law, but from that it need not follow that the tests are identical. For they were designed to control very different sorts of decisions. When a situation is covered by one of the Federal Rules, the question facing the court is a far cry from the typical, relatively unguided Erie choice: the court has been instructed to apply the Federal Rule, and can refuse to do so only if the Advisory Committee, this Court, and Congress erred in their prima facie judgment that the Rule in question transgresses neither the terms of the Enabling Act nor constitutional restrictions.

We are reminded by the Erie opinion that neither Congress nor the federal courts can, under the guise of formulating rules of decision for federal courts, fashion rules which are not supported by a grant of federal authority contained in Article I or some other section of the Constitution; in such areas state law must govern because there can be no other law. But the opinion in Erie, which involved no Federal Rule and dealt with a question which was "substantive" in every traditional sense (whether the railroad owed a duty of care to Tompkins as a trespasser or a licensee), surely neither said nor implied that measures like Rule 4(d)(1) are unconstitutional. For the constitutional provision for a federal court system (augmented by the Necessary and Proper Clause) carries with it congressional power to make rules governing the practice and pleading in those courts, which in turn includes a power to regulate matters which, though falling within the uncertain area between substance and procedure, are rationally capable of classification as either. Neither York nor the cases following it ever suggested that the rule there laid down for coping with situations where no Federal Rule applies is coextensive with the limitation on Congress to which Erie had adverted. Although this Court has never been confronted with a case where the applicable Federal Rule is in direct collision with a relevant State, courts of appeals faced with such clashes have rightly discerned the limits of our decisions.

One of the shaping purposes of the Federal Rules is to bring about uniformity in the federal system by getting away from local rules. This is especially true of matters which relate to the administration of legal proceedings, an area in which federal courts have traditionally exerted strong independent power completely aside from the powers Congress expressly conferred in the Rules. The purpose of the ‘saving to the states’ doctrine, even as extended in York and Ragan, was never to bottle up federal courts with ‘affirmative countermeasures’ or ‘determinative’ and ‘integral-relations’ stoppers— when there are ‘affirmative countermeasures’ [federal] considerations’ and when there is a Congressional mandate (the Rules) superseding state constitutional authority.

Erie and its offspring cast no doubt on the long-recognized power of Congress to make housekeeping rules for federal courts even though some of those rules will inevitably differ from comparable state rules. “When, because the plaintiff happens to be a non-resident, a right is enforceable in a federal as well as in a State court, the forms and modes of proceeding for the right may at times, naturally enough, vary because the two judicial systems are different.” Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, supra, at 108; Cohen v. Beneficial Loan Corp., 337 U. S. 507, 532. Though a court, in measuring a Federal Rule against the standards contained in the Constitution and the Constitution, need not wholly blind itself to the degree to which the Rule conflicts with the Constitution, it should not do so unless the character and result of the federal litigation stray from the course it would follow in state court. It cannot be forgotten that the Erie rule, and the guidelines suggested in York, were designed to serve another purpose altogether. To hold that a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure must be invalid whenever it alters the mode of enforcing state-created rights would be to disregard either the Constitution’s grant of power over federal procedure or Congress’ attempt to limit that power in the Enabling Act. Rule 4(d)(1) is valid and controls the instant case.

Justice HARLAN, concurring.

It is unquestionably true that up to now Erie and the cases following it have not been helpful in articulating a workable doctrine governing choice of law in diversity actions. The Court’s effort to clarify the situation in today’s opinion. However, in doing so I have misconceived the constitutional premises of Erie and has failed to deal adequately with the precedents and past decisions upon which the courts below relied.

Erie was something more than an opinion which worried about “forum-shopping and the avoidance of inequitable administration of the laws,” although to be sure these were important factors in the making of the decision. I have always regarded that decision as one of the modern cornerstones of federalism, expressing policies that profoundly touch the allocation of judicial power between the state and federal systems. Erie recognized that there should not be two conflicting sets of rules of law controlling the primary activity of citizens, for such alternative governing authorities necessarily give rise to a debilitating uncertainty in the planning of everyday affairs. The Court has recognized that the scheme of our Constitution envisions an allocation of law-making power between the national and state governments.

Justice Harlan agrees that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, rather than state law, should govern service of process in this case, but disagrees with the majority’s rationale. What test does Justice Harlan propose and how does it differ from the majority’s test?

What does Justice Harlan mean by “primary activity”? How does this concept help distinguish “substantive” from “procedural” legal rules?

between state and federal legislative processes which is undercut if the federal judiciary can make substantive law affecting state affairs beyond the bounds of congressional legislative powers in this regard. Thus, in diversity cases Erie commands that it be the state law governing primary private activity which prevails.

The shorthand formulations which have appeared in some past decisions are prone to carry untoward results that frequently arise from oversimplification. The Court is quite right in stating that the "outcome-determinative" test of Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, if taken literally, proves too much, for any rule, no matter how clearly "procedural," can affect the outcome of litigation if it is not obeyed. In turning from the "outcome" test of York back to the unadorned forum-shopping rationale of Erie, however, the Court falls prey to like over-simplification, for a simple forum-shopping rule also proves too much; litigants often choose a federal forum merely to obtain what they consider the advantages of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or to try their cases before a supposedly more favorable judge. To my mind the proper line of approach in determining whether to apply a state or a federal rule, whether "substantive" or "procedural," is to stay close to basic principles by inquiring if the choice of rule would substantially affect those primary decisions respecting human conduct which our constitutional system leaves to state regulation. If so, Erie and the Constitution require that the state rule prevail, even in the face of a conflicting federal rule.

The Court weakens, if indeed it does not submerge, this basic principle by finding, in effect, a grant of substantive legislative power in the constitutional provision for a federal court system and through it, setting up the Federal Rules as a body of law inviolate.

[T]he constitutional provision for a federal court system carries with it congressional power to regulate matters which, though falling within the uncertain area between substance and procedure, are rationally capable of classification as either.

So long as a reasonable man could characterize any duly adopted federal rule as "procedural," the Court, unless I misapprehend what is said, would have it apply no matter how seriously it frustrated a State's substantive regulation of the primary conduct and affairs of its citizens. Since the members of the Advisory Committee, the Judicial Conference, and this Court who formulated the Federal Rules are presumably reasonable men, it follows that the integrity of the Federal Rules is absolute. Whereas the unadulterated outcome and forum-shopping tests may err too far toward honoring state rules, I submit that the Court's "arguably procedural, ergo constitutional" test moves too fast and far in the other direction.

The courts below relied upon this Court's decisions in Ragan v. Merchants Transfer Co. and Cohen v. Beneficial Loan Corp.. Those cases deserve more attention than this Court has given them, particularly Ragan which, if still good law, would in my opinion call for affirmance of the result reached by the Court of Appeals. Further, a discussion of these two cases will serve to illuminate the "diversity" thesis I am advocating.

In Ragan a Kansas statute of limitations provided that an action was deemed commenced when service was made on the defendant. Despite Federal Rule 3 which provides that an action commences with the filing of the complaint, the Court held that for purposes of the Kansas statute of limitations a diversity tort action commenced only when service was made upon the defendant. The effect of this holding was that although the plaintiff had filed his federal complaint within the state period of limitations, his action was barred because marshal did not serve a summons on the defendant until after the limitations period had run. Plaintiffs argue that the decision was wrong. At most, application of the Federal Rule would have required that potential Kansas tort defendants would have to defer for a few days the start of their defense, knowing that they had not been sued within the limitations period. The choice of the Federal Rule would have had no effect on the primary stages of private activity from which the suit originated, and only the most minimal effect on behavior following the commission of the tort. In these circumstances the interest of the federal system in proceeding under its own rules prevailed.

Cohen v. Beneficial Loan Corp. held that a federal diversity court must apply a requiring a small stockholder in a stockholder derivative suit to post a bond securing of defense costs as a condition to prosecuting an action. Such a statute is not determinative"; the plaintiff can win with or without it. The Court now rationalizes the ground that the statute might affect the plaintiff's choice of forum, but as has turned out, a simple forum-shopping test proves too much. The proper view of Cohen is, instead, that the statute was meant to inhibit small stockholders from instituting "strike suits" which it was designed and could be expected to have a substantial impact on private principles. Anyone who was at the trial bar during the period when Cohen arose can appreciate the state policy reflected in the statute. I think it wholly legitimate to view Federal Rule 13, purporting to deal with the problem. But even had the Federal Rules purported to do so, so doing provided a substantially less effective deterrent to strike suits, I think the plaintiff should still have prevailed. That is where I believe the Court's view differs from mine. The Court attributes such overriding force to the Federal Rules that it is hard to think of a conflicting state rule would be allowed to operate, even though the state rule reflects considerations which, under Erie, would lie within the realm of state legislative authority.

It remains to apply what has been said to the present case. The Massachusetts rule an executor need not answer suits unless in-hand service was made upon him or action was filed in the proper registry of probate within one year of his giving bond. intent of this statute is to permit an executor to distribute the estate which he is able without fear that further liabilities may be outstanding for which he could be held liable. If the Federal District Court in Massachusetts applies Rule 4(d)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure instead of the Massachusetts service rule, what effect would the speed and assurance with which estates are distributed? As I see it, the effect would be substantial. It would mean simply that an executor would have to check at his own federal courthouse as well as the registry of probate before he could distribute the assets of the estate with impunity. As this does not seem enough to give rise to any real impairment on the state policy which the Massachusetts rule is intended to serve, I concur in the judgment of the Court.

Dolphin Kickboxing Co. v. Franchoice, Inc., No. 19-cv-1477 (D. Minn. May 6, 2020)

ELIZABETH COWAN WRIGHT, Magistrate Judge.

This matter is before the Court on Plaintiffs' Motion to Amend Complaint. For the reasons stated below, the Motion is granted in part and denied in part.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

The "Facts" section of the proposed amended complaint is exactly the same as found in the original Complaint. For the sake of brevity, the Court incorporates the "Facts" section found in its Report and Recommendation into this Order. The proposed amended complaint also contained the same claim for fraud as found in the original Complaint. Defendants did not move to dismiss the common law fraud claim as part of their Motion to Dismiss. The claim alleged that Defendants committed fraud by knowingly making false representations to Plaintiffs for the purpose of inducing them to purchase an ILKB franchise. In addition, the fraud claim alleges that these representations proved to be untrue; Plaintiffs reasonably relied on this information in deciding to purchase an ILKB franchise, and as a result Plaintiffs have suffered damages of no less than $500,000.

The only substantive addition to the proposed amended complaint is Count V seeking punitive damages. This proposed count incorporates the allegations in the preceding paragraphs and then alleges as follows:

Defendants deliberately and intentionally disregarded the rights of Plaintiffs and disregarded the substantial likelihood of serious injury and damages to Plaintiffs by representing that they offered to match Plaintiffs only with franchises that Defendants had investigated and vetted; that such franchises were of high quality; and that Defendants would provide Plaintiffs with all knowledge necessary to make an informed decisions [sic], when, in fact:

- Defendants knew that the founder of ILKB, Michael Parrella, had filed for bankruptcy in 2003 and that his discharge had been vacated in 2008; and knew or should have known, in the exercise of reasonable inquiry of Parrella's bankruptcy consistent with their representations to Plaintiffs, that Parrella's discharge had been revoked for failure to pay federal taxes and that there were two adversary proceedings in the bankruptcy accusing Parrella of fraud and fraudulent transfers.
- Defendants failed to perform any serious, systematic or professional due diligence upon ILKB; instead all they did was talk to a few existing franchisees, many of whom did not own the type of ILKB franchise that Plaintiffs were considering buying, and Defendants prepared no report, summary or investigation of ILKB.
- Defendants simply took representations of ILKB about the nature of the franchise, including the representations that it was suitable for absentee ownership; that no units had closed; that average ILKB franchisees made revenues and profits at a certain level; and that ILKB did all of the marketing for franchisees, and passed them on to Plaintiffs without checking on them.
- Defendants knew that ILKB engaged in blatantly illegal marketing techniques as early as March 2015 and never questioned whether such techniques had ceased, thus exposing Plaintiffs to the high likelihood, if not certainty, that Plaintiffs would be the victims of fraud.

- Defendants disregarded complaints and warning signs from ILKB franchisees as they chose to believe the franchisees were “stupid, selfish and ungrateful franchisees” instead of investigating such complaints and determining whether they were true.
- Defendants made specific representations as set forth in the proposed amended complaint that ILKB was not negligent without investigating or verifying them, when such representations were false or knew or should have been known to Defendants as false.

According to the proposed amended complaint, as a result of Defendants’ deliberate disregard of Plaintiffs’ rights, Plaintiffs are entitled to punitive damages.

II. LEGAL STANDARD

The Court held oral argument during which it sua sponte raised the issue of the standard for adding punitive damages claims. Both parties had initially addressed written submissions the appropriateness of amending the Complaint to add a claim for punitive damages under Minnesota Statutes Sections 549.191 and 549.20. The Court ordered the parties to file supplemental pleadings with respect to their positions regarding whether Minn. Stat. § 549.191, or Rule 15 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, applies to a motion to add a claim for punitive damages. Both parties filed supplemental briefs and agreed, based on recent decisions within this District, that Rule 15, and not Minn. Stat. § 549 applies to a motion to amend. That said, the parties disagree about whether the proposed amended complaint plausibly sets forth a claim for punitive damages under Minn. Stat. § 549.

Rule 15(a) sets the general standard for amending pleadings in Federal court. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a) provides that leave to amend “shall be freely given when justice so requires.” The standard for determining whether to grant leave to amend is left to the sound discretion of the trial court. The Eighth Circuit has held that although amendment of a pleading is allowed liberally to ensure that a case is decided on its merits there is no absolute right to amend.

Denial of leave to amend may be justified by “undue delay, bad faith on the part of the party, futility of the amendment or unfair prejudice to the opposing party.” Denial of leave to amend on the basis of futility means the district court has reached the conclusion that the amended complaint could not withstand a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Accordingly, in reviewing a denial of leave to amend we ask whether the proposed amended complaint states a cause of action that satisfies the Twombly pleading standard.”

On a motion to dismiss filed pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), the Court must take the allegations of a claim as true, and construe the pleading, and all reasonable inferences therefrom, most favorably to the pleader. To survive a motion to dismiss, a claim “must be plausible.” A claim is facially plausible “when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to infer more than the naked assertion of a right.” The court must accept as true the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.”

Minn. Stat. § 549.191 prohibits a party from pleading a claim for punitive damages before the commencement of a lawsuit. The statute then provides a mechanism for amending the complaint:

The Twombly standard and Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) are covered in the unit on pleading.

Upon commencement of a civil action, the complaint must not seek punitive damages. After filing the suit a party may make a motion to amend the pleadings to claim punitive damages. The motion must allege the applicable legal basis under section 549.20 or other law for awarding punitive damages in the action and must be accompanied by one or more affidavits showing the factual basis for the claim. At the hearing on the motion, if the court finds prima facie evidence in support of the motion, the court shall grant the moving party permission to amend the pleadings to claim punitive damages.

The relevant legal basis for punitive damages under Minnesota law provides:

Punitive damages shall be allowed in civil actions only upon clear and convincing evidence that the acts of the defendant show deliberate disregard for the rights or safety of others.

- b. A defendant has acted with deliberate disregard for the rights or safety of others if the defendant has knowledge of facts or intentionally disregards facts that create a high probability of injury to the rights or safety of others and:
 1. deliberately proceeds to act in conscious or intentional disregard of the high degree of probability of injury to the rights or safety of others; or
 2. deliberately proceeds to act with indifference to the high probability of injury to the rights or safety of others.

Courts in the District of Minnesota have historically applied the state statute, Minn. Stat. § 549.191, rather than Rule 15, to motions to amend to add a claim for punitive damages, in diversity actions, such as the present action. However, this practice has come under scrutiny over the last couple years in light of the apparent conflict between the Minnesota statute and Rule 15.

Indeed, courts have recently taken another look at the practice and analyzed whether Rule 15 or Minn. Stat. § 549.191 should be applied in view of the 2010 United States Supreme Court's decision in Shady Grove Assocs., P.A. v. Allstate Ins. Co., 559 U.S. 393 (2010). The large majority of these courts now apply Rule 15 instead of Minn. Stat. § 549.191 when considering motions to add punitive damage claims.

"Shady Grove instructs that 'a federal court exercising diversity jurisdiction should not apply a state law or rule if (1) a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 'answers the same question' as the state law or rule and (2) the Federal Rule does not violate the Rules Enabling Act.'" Five of the Supreme Court justices in Shady Grove concluded that the first step in the analysis looks to whether the federal rule directly conflicts with the state law, which occurs where the federal rule "answers the question in dispute." If it does, Rule 15 applies—Minn. Stat. § 549.191 notwithstanding—"unless it exceeds statutory authorization or Congress's rulemaking power."

In Shady Grove, the Supreme Court examined the applicability in a diversity action of N.Y. Civ. Prac. Law § 901(b), which precluded a suit to recover a "penalty" from proceeding as a class action, versus Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which allows all class action cases to be maintained as long as the requirements of Rule 23 are met. The Court concluded that "Rule

23 provides a one-size-fits-all formula for deciding the class-action question. Because Rule 23 attempts to answer the same question—i.e., it states that Shady Grove's suit must be maintained as a class action' because of the relief it seeks—it cannot apply in diversity actions unless Rule 23 is ultra vires."

Here, Rule 15 provides a "one-size-fits-all-formula" for amendments. Rule 15 does not require an evidentiary requirement. Instead, as set forth above, the focus as to the viability of an amendment under Rule 15 with respect to all claims and requests for relief focuses on whether that is, whether an amended complaint alleges sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face under Rule 8 (in conjunction with the requirements of Rule 9 with respect to allegations of fraud), so as to withstand a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). On the other hand, a motion to amend to add punitive damages under § 549.191 requires in part "one or more affidavits showing the factual basis for the new facts outside of the proposed amended pleading and only allows the amendment if "there is prima facie evidence in the support of the motion." Because Minn. Stat. § 549.191 does not attempt to answer the same question as Rule 15 regarding when an amendment should be allowed, § 549.191 cannot apply in diversity actions unless Rule 15 violates the Enabling Act.

The Enabling Act provides that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure "shall not abridge, impair, or modify any substantive right. All laws in conflict with such rules shall be of no effect after such rules have taken effect." 28 U.S.C. § 2072(b). In Shady Grove, Justice Stevens, writing for the plurality, held:

In sum, it is not the substantive or procedural nature or purpose of the affected statute that matters, but the substantive or procedural nature of the Federal Rule. We have held since 1938 and reaffirmed repeatedly, that the validity of a Federal Rule depends entirely upon whether it regulates procedure. If it does, it is authorized by § 2072 and is valid in all jurisdictions, without regard to all claims, regardless of its incidental effect upon state-created rights.

Although Justice Stevens joined the four other Justices in the plurality with respect to the first step in the analysis of Shady Grove as part of his concurrence, he differed with the plurality with respect to when a Federal Rule violates the Enabling Act:

A federal rule cannot govern a particular case in which the rule would displace a state right or regulate procedural in the ordinary course of the term but is so intertwined with a state right or regulation that it functions to define the scope of the state-created right.

That said, even Justice Stevens acknowledged that "the bar for finding an Enabling Act violation is a high one."

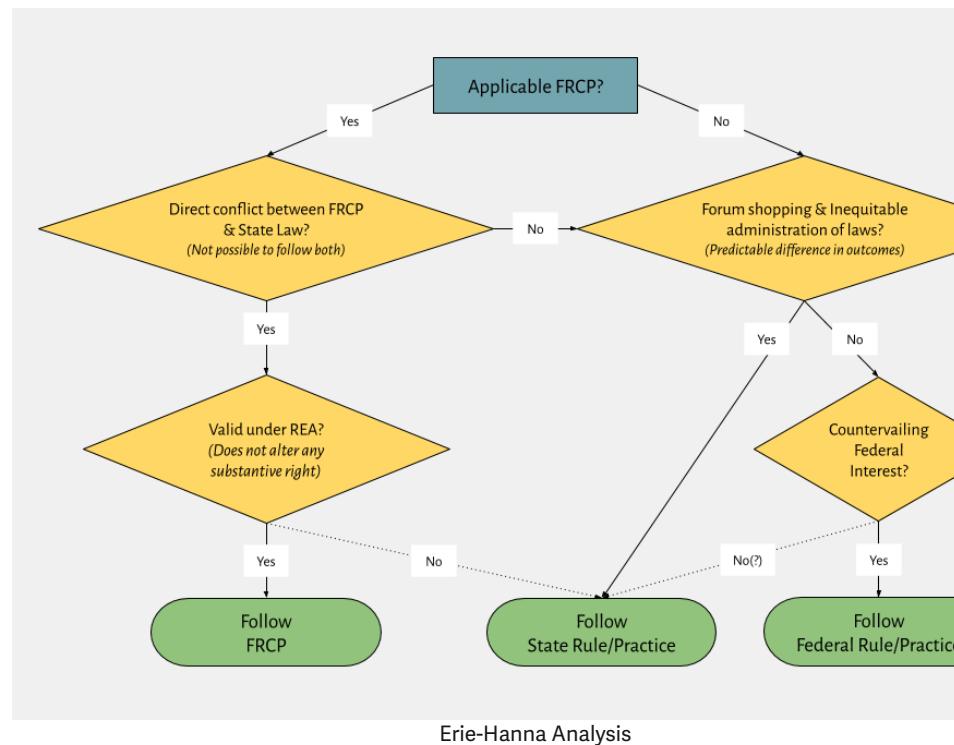

This Court concludes the plurality holding in Shady Grove regarding the Enabling Act is in line with the Supreme Court's previous holding in Sibbach that the analysis must focus on whether a Federal Rule really regulates procedure. Here, both Rules 8 and 9 govern the standard and content of a complaint and Rule 15 governs when a pleading, such as a complaint, can be amended within the confines of Rules 8 and 9. As such, the Court finds that Rules 8 and 15 regulate procedure under the both the plurality holding in Shady Grove and the holding in Sibbach.

The Court recognizes that there is a split of opinion regarding whether Justice Stevens' opinion supplies the controlling test. Even assuming that Justice Stevens' test controls, the Court concludes that the application of Rules 8, 9, and 15 to Plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend does not violate the Enabling Act. In his concurrence, Justice Stevens (in concluding that Rule 23 did not violate the Enabling Act) looked to a number of factors, including whether the conflicting state law "is designed as a procedural rule", thereby suggesting that "it reflects a judgment about how state courts ought to operate and not a judgment about the scope of state-created rights and remedies."

Here, the fact that the Minnesota procedural law setting forth how to bring a motion to amend to add punitive damages, § 549.191, is separate from the actual scope of a substantive claim for punitive damages (set forth in Minn. Stat. § 549.20), supports a finding that the substantive right and the procedural requirements are not so intertwined that the procedural requirements are a "judgment about the scope of state-created rights and remedies." There is nothing within § 549.191, outside of referencing § 549.20, that defines the substantive dimension of the punitive damages claim itself under Minnesota law. Section 549.20 governs the scope of punitive damages, and not only will Plaintiffs need to plausibly allege a claim for punitive damages that meets the substantive requirements of that statute, they will also still need to prove at trial their entitlement to punitive damages by clear and convincing evidence, regardless of the application of Rule 15 in deciding their motion to amend. In other words, the application of Rule 15 instead of § 549.191 satisfies Justice Stevens' test as it will not "abridge, enlarge or modify any ultimate state substantive right."

Accordingly, the Court will apply the Rule 15 standard in determining whether to grant Plaintiffs' motion to amend to add a claim for punitive damages based on the allegations in the proposed amended complaint.

4. Review Questions

Question 1

Peggy was employed by Sterling Cooper, P.C. She had a written employment contract for a three year term of employment, during which Sterling Cooper could not terminate her employment except for cause. The contract specifies that "cause for termination is not limited to, employee misconduct, dishonesty, or unsatisfactory performance of job duties."

Before the contract term ended, Peggy was fired. Her boss, Don, told her the reason was poor job performance, but Peggy believes the real reason was her rejection of Don's repeated unwelcome advances.

Peggy sues Sterling Cooper in federal court, asserting a claim for breach of contract under Hudson state law. Assume the court has personal and subject matter jurisdiction.

In her complaint, Peggy seeks compensatory damages for her loss of employment.

Part A

Under Hudson state law, compensatory damages for wrongful termination in breach of an employment contract are limited to an amount equal to three times the plaintiff's annual earnings (wages or salary) in their last year of employment. In contrast, in cases for wrongful termination under federal law, there is no such cap on the amount of compensatory damages.

Which rule should the federal court apply in this case?

Part B

Under Hudson state law, a complaint for breach of contract must include an itemized statement showing the basis and amount of compensatory damages sought. In contrast, under FRCP Rule 8(a)(3), the "demand for relief sought" requires only a general statement that the plaintiff seeks compensatory damages.

Which rule should the federal court apply in this case?

Question 2

The Carbolic Smoke Ball Company ("Carbolic") runs an ad in the Pall Mall Gazette. The ad claims that the company's Carbolic Smoke Ball is "clinically proven to prevent colds and flu when used as directed." In fact, the product does nothing at all, other than emit foul-smelling smoke, and the company never conducted any tests, clinical or otherwise.

After reading the ad, Carlill buys a Carbolic Smoke Ball and uses it as directed three times a day for several weeks. She is chagrined when she contracts the flu anyway. It turns out to be an especially bad case of the flu, requiring hospitalization and expensive medical treatment.

Carlill sues Carbolic for fraud under Euphoria state law. Her complaint alleges that Carbolic's ad made false claims about the health benefits of the Smoke Ball, that Carbolic knew those claims were false, and that Carbolic made those claims with an intent to induce consumers to buy the product. In the complaint, Carlill requests the following relief:

- $80,000 in punitive and compensatory damages, and
- a permanent injunction prohibiting Carbolic from continuing to run ads making fraudulent claims about the Carbolic Smoke Ball's health benefits.

Carlill files her suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Euphoria, which has subject matter jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship.

Part A

FRCP Rule 8(a)(3) provides that a complaint must include "a demand for the relief sought, which may include relief in the alternative or different types of relief." Under this rule, a plaintiff may request both legal remedies (usually money damages) and equitable relief (such as an injunction) in the same complaint.

In contrast, under Euphoria state law, a plaintiff who seeks both legal remedies and equitable relief must file two complaints, one seeking the legal remedy and another seeking equitable relief. Both complaints will go to the same court, which will treat them as a single action for all purposes. If (either on summary judgment or at trial) the defendant is found liable, the court will then hold a separate hearing to determine whether the plaintiff is entitled to the other equitable relief sought.

Carbolic objects that Carlill's request for both money damages and an injunction in the same complaint is improper under Euphoria law. Carlill argues that federal law, not state law, controls whether she may seek both types of relief in the same complaint.

Should the court apply state or federal law on this issue?

Part B

Under Euphoria state law, a consumer asserting a fraud claim based on an advertisement must plead and prove the following elements:

1. The defendant made false claims about the product
2. The defendant knew the claims were false
3. The defendant made the claims with the intent to induce consumers to buy the product
4. The plaintiff reasonably relied on the claims in deciding to buy the product.

In contrast, under the FTC Act (a federal statute), an advertiser is liable for false advertising if it was unreasonable for a consumer to have relied on the defendant's false claims. The FTC Act authorizes the Federal Trade Commission to bring civil suits for false advertising, but does not give individual consumers a private right of action.

The Company moves to dismiss Carlill's complaint for failure to state a claim, because the complaint fails to allege that Carlill reasonably relied on the claims in the advertisement regarding the supposed health benefits of the Carbolic Smoke Ball.

Should the federal court apply state or federal law on the issue of whether Carlill must prove reasonable reliance?

Chapter 6

Pleading

1. Notice Pleading under the FRCP

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 3

A civil action is commenced by filing a complaint with the court.

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 7

(a) Pleadings. Only these pleadings are allowed:

- (1) a complaint;
- (2) an answer to a complaint;
- (3) an answer to a counterclaim designated as a counterclaim;
- (4) an answer to a crossclaim;
- (5) a third-party complaint;
- (6) an answer to a third-party complaint; and
- (7) if the court orders one, a reply to an answer.

(b) Motions and Other Papers.

(1) In General. A request for a court order must be made by motion. The motion must:

- (A) be in writing unless made during a hearing or trial;
- (B) state with particularity the grounds for seeking the order; and
- (C) state the relief sought.

(2) Form. The rules governing captions and other matters of form in pleadings apply to motions and other papers.

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 8

(a) Claim for Relief. A pleading that states a claim for relief must contain:

- (1) a short and plain statement of the grounds for the court's jurisdiction, unless the court already has jurisdiction and the claim needs no new jurisdictional support;
- (2) a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief;
- (3) a demand for the relief sought, which may include relief in the alternative or all or some types of relief.

(b) Defenses; Admissions and Denials.

- (1) In General. In responding to a pleading, a party must:

- (A) state in short and plain terms its defenses to each claim asserted against it;
- (B) admit or deny the allegations asserted against it by an opposing party.

(d) Pleading to Be Concise and Direct; Alternative Statements; Inconsistency.

- (1) In General. Each allegation must be simple, concise, and direct. No technical terms or legal concepts need be used unless they are necessary to make the party's position clear.

- (2) Alternative Statements of a Claim or Defense. A party may set out 2 or more statements of a claim or defense alternatively or hypothetically, either in a single count or in separate counts. If a party makes alternative statements, the pleading is sufficient if one of them is sufficient.

- (3) Inconsistent Claims or Defenses. A party may state as many separate claims or defenses as it has, regardless of consistency.

(e) Construing Pleadings. Pleadings must be construed so as to do justice.

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 9

(a) Capacity or Authority to Sue; Legal Existence.

- (1) In General. Except when required to show that the court has jurisdiction, a party need not allege:

- (A) a party's capacity to sue or be sued;

- (B) a party's authority to sue or be sued in a representative capacity; or

- (C) the legal existence of an organized association of persons that is made a party.

- (2) Raising Those Issues. To raise any of those issues, a party must do so by a specific allegation which must state any supporting facts that are peculiarly within the party's knowledge.

(b) Fraud or Mistake; Conditions of Mind. In alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake. Malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind may be alleged generally.

(c) Conditions Precedent. In pleading conditions precedent, it suffices to allege generally that all conditions precedent have occurred or been performed. But when denying that a condition precedent has occurred or been performed, a party must do so with particularity.

(f) Time and Place. An allegation of time or place is material when testing the sufficiency of a pleading.

(g) Special Damages. If an item of special damage is claimed, it must be specifically stated.

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 10

(a) Caption; Names of Parties. Every pleading must have a caption with the court's name, a title, a file number, and a Rule 7(a) designation. The title of the complaint must name all the parties; the title of other pleadings, after naming the first party on each side, may refer generally to other parties.

(b) Paragraphs; Separate Statements. A party must state its claims or defenses in numbered paragraphs, each limited as far as practicable to a single set of circumstances. A later pleading may refer by number to a paragraph in an earlier pleading. If doing so would promote clarity, each claim founded on a separate transaction or occurrence—and each defense other than a denial—must be stated in a separate count or defense.

(c) Adoption by Reference; Exhibits. A statement in a pleading may be adopted by reference elsewhere in the same pleading or in any other pleading or motion. A copy of a written instrument that is an exhibit to a pleading is a part of the pleading for all purposes.

2. Claims for Relief

2.1 Short and Plain Statement

Weiland v. Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office, 792 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2013)

ED CARNES, Chief Judge

Nearly one hundred and thirty years ago, one of Georgia's greatest judges described a pleading:

Pleading is pure statement; just as much as a letter addressed to your sweetheart or your friend. The plaintiff complains that he has such a case, and he tells you what the defendant says either that that is not so, or something else is so, and he makes his statement. The true rule ought to be this: the statement ought to consist precisely of what has to be said, and ought not to fall short, or go beyond. If it goes beyond, it has surplusage matter that is unnecessary. Whatever is irrelevant, whatever is non-essential in statement, ought not to be in. I declare that every man's pleadings shall embrace a full and clear statement of all matters which he is required to prove, and no other.

Logan Bleckley, "Pleading," 3 Ga. Bar Assoc. Report 40, 41-42 (1886). The complaint Weiland filed in federal court in Florida in his appeal from the state trial court does not approach that ideal, but it claims that the plaintiff has a cause of action. It does a good enough job in telling what that case is to require the defendants to say that is not so, or something else is so."

The story that Christopher Weiland's complaint tells is about two Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office deputies shooting, tasering, and beating him in his own bedroom without provocation during their response to a "Baker Act call."^[17] Finding that the late Christopher Weiland's complaint failed to comply with Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2), the district court dismissed with prejudice his § 1983 claims against the deputies and the Sheriff's Office. As an alternative ground for the dismissal of the § 1983 claims against the Sheriff's Office, the court found that Weiland had failed to plausibly allege a custom or policy of indifference sufficient to impose municipal liability. The district court also denied sovereign immunity grounds two of his three state law claims; the third one it remanded to the court. This is Weiland's appeal.

I.

The allegations in Weiland's third amended complaint, which we accept as true for purposes, are as follows.

On April 6, 2007, Weiland's father called 911 and stated that his son—who at the time was suffering from bipolar disorder—was "acting up," was "on drugs" (prescription painkillers), and had a gun." This was not the first time the Sheriff's Office had dealt with the young man; in fact, he had been "Baker Acted" on at least two earlier occasions after threatening to harm himself.

Deputies Christopher Fleming and Michael Johnson were dispatched to the Weiland residence. When they arrived, Weiland's father met them outside of the house and explained that his son had threatened to harm himself and that he might have a gun. As he escorted the deputies into the house, he told them that Weiland was in a bedroom at the end of a hallway.

^{17.}(n.1 in opinion) The Baker Act is a Florida law that permits a person to be "involuntarily examined" by a mental health facility "if there is reason to believe that the person has a mental illness and because of his or her mental illness there is a substantial likelihood that without care or treatment the person will cause serious bodily harm to himself or herself or others."

Fleming and Johnson, guns drawn, approached the bedroom without calling out or identifying themselves. The deputies “came upon Weiland sitting on the edge of a bed looking down at a shotgun that lay loosely in his lap.” Suddenly and without warning, Johnson fired two rounds at Weiland, knocking him off the bed. As Weiland lay on the floor bleeding and critically injured, Fleming tasered him. Then both Johnson and Fleming “physically beat and assaulted Weiland before finally handcuffing one of his hands to a dresser.” At no point did Weiland raise the shotgun from his lap or point it at the deputies.

In an effort to cover up their assault on Weiland, Johnson and Fleming “fabricated an elaborate story about Weiland running from them into another room, grabbing a shotgun, sitting in a chair and then pointing the gun at the Deputies as they entered the doorway.” They also said that Weiland’s gun had discharged during the scuffle.

Weiland was charged with two counts of aggravated assault on a law enforcement officer and incarcerated for nearly two years awaiting trial. And then at his trial:

Fleming and Johnson’s story fell apart. No blood was found in the office/bedroom they claimed Weiland ran into before he armed himself and was subsequently shot. No buckshot or other projectiles were recovered from a hole in the office wall Fleming and Johnson claimed was from Weiland’s alleged shotgun blast. In fact, during trial, it was revealed that Johnson had removed Weiland’s shotgun from the so-called crime scene to another unknown location, finally returning and placing it in the custody of crime scene investigators nearly 7-8 hours after the incident.

The jury acquitted Weiland of the charges against him.

II.

Weiland filed this lawsuit in state court on January 12, 2011. His original complaint and first amended complaint asserted only state law claims. On December 17, 2012, Weiland filed a second amended complaint that added multiple claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The defendants removed the case to the Southern District of Florida and filed a motion to dismiss.

In May 2013 the district court dismissed without prejudice all of Weiland’s § 1983 claims. It concluded that the four counts asserting those claims violated Rule 8(a)(2) and Rule 10(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure because they “incorporated all of the factual allegations contained in paragraphs 1 through 30 inclusive, failed to identify which legal theories or constitutional amendments govern which counts, and failed to identify which allegations are relevant to the elements of which legal theories.” Even though it dismissed all of Weiland’s federal claims, the district court observed that “viewing the alleged facts in the light most favorable to Weiland Defendants violated Weiland’s fourth amendment constitutional rights when they shot him.” The court gave Weiland until May 29, 2013 to amend his complaint.

On that deadline, Weiland filed a third amended complaint, which is the operative case. The first 49 paragraphs of the third amended complaint consist of an statement, a jurisdiction section, a parties section, and a facts section. The fact three subsections: (1) “Facts Surrounding the Shooting of [Christopher Weiland Sheriff’s Office’s] Deliberate Indifference”; and (3) “[The Sheriff’s Office’s] C remainder of the complaint is organized into seven counts, each of which begins realleges and reavers the allegations of paragraphs 1-49 inclusive, and alleges further.

The first four counts are § 1983 claims. Count one claims that Fleming, Johnson, and Deputies, acting under color of state law, violated Weiland’s constitutional rights to excessive and unreasonable force.” Count two claims that the Sheriff’s Office “did not train or supervise its Sheriff Deputies in the use of appropriate and proportionate force when detaining mentally ill citizens. Count three claims that Fleming, Johnson, and the Sheriff’s Office conspired to cover up their violations of Weiland’s constitutional rights. And count four claims that the Sheriff’s Office had a custom or policy of using its internal affairs investigation unit to “perpetrate a coverup of any misconduct by Deputies.”

The final three counts of the complaint are brought under Florida tort law and all involve claims against the Sheriff’s Office. Count five claims that the Sheriff’s Office used of force (count five), intentional infliction of emotional distress (count six), and malicious prosecution (count seven). All three of those claims are brought only against the Sheriff’s Office.

Defendants moved to dismiss the third amended complaint. On August 28, 2013, the court issued an order granting in part and denying in part defendants’ motion to remand the remainder of the action to state court. The court dismissed all of the § 1983 claims (counts one through four)—this time with prejudice—because the plaintiff failed to state a claim for relief that did not “duplicate the violations of Rule 8(a)(2) and 10(b) which formed the basis of the court’s earlier order of dismissal of those counts.” The court also concluded, with respect to three of the remaining counts, that the plaintiff failed to state a claim for relief because he asserted against the Sheriff’s Office, that the “allegations failed to provide any facts or legal theory beyond merely referring to alleged practices and policies promulgated by [the Sheriff’s Office].”

As an alternative ground for dismissal of counts two and four, which alleged that the Sheriff’s Office failed to adequately train its deputies and maintained a custom or policy of using excessive force, the court determined that Weiland did not state a claim for relief because he failed to plausibly allege an official policy or custom required for municipal liability under § 1983.

As an alternative ground for the dismissal of the part of count three that involved the Sheriff’s Office itself, the court ruled that Weiland’s allegations of conspiracy among Fleming, Johnson, and the Sheriff’s Office were “conclusory” as to the Sheriff’s Office. But not as to Fleming and Johnson, as the court added in a footnote: “However, the court finds that with respect to Defendants Fleming and Johnson, the Plaintiff has pled sufficient facts to meet the requirements for a conspiracy.” Just as the court had earlier observed that Weiland’s third amended complaint stated a Fourth Amendment claim, it found that his third amended complaint stated a conspiracy claim even though it had dismissed that claim based on Rule 8(a)(2) and 10(b).

Finally, the court concluded that sovereign immunity barred Weiland's state law claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress and malicious prosecution and dismissed them for that reason. The court, however, took "no position" on whether Weiland had stated a claim under Florida law for excessive force; instead, it declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction and remanded that claim to state court.

III.

A.

We first address whether the district court abused its discretion when it dismissed Weiland's constitutional claims against Johnson and Fleming in counts one and three of the complaint for failure to comply with Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) and 10(b).

It is unclear from the district court's order what authority it relied on in dismissing the claims against Johnson and Fleming. The order does not cite Rule 41(b)—which authorizes the dismissal with prejudice of an action for failure to obey a court order or a federal rule—nor does it make the findings necessary to justify a dismissal under that provision. For that reason, we will not assume that the court was acting under Rule 41(b). And given the court's observations that Weiland's allegations against Johnson and Fleming could state a claim for relief, we infer that the dismissal of those particular claims was not based on the failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6).

With Rule 41(b) and Rule 12(b)(6) off the table, we are left to conclude that the dismissal of Weiland's claims against the two deputies was based on the district court's inherent authority to control its docket and ensure the prompt resolution of lawsuits, which in some circumstances includes the power to dismiss a complaint for failure to comply with Rule 8(a)(2) and Rule 10(b). Our standard of review of such dismissals is abuse of discretion.

Rule 8(a)(2) requires a complaint to include "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Rule 10(b) further provides:

A party must state its claims or defenses in numbered paragraphs, each limited as far as practicable to a single set of circumstances. A later pleading may refer by number to a paragraph in an earlier pleading. If doing so would promote clarity, each claim founded on a separate transaction or occurrence—and each defense other than a denial—must be stated in a separate count or defense.

Complaints that violate either Rule 8(a)(2) or Rule 10(b), or both, are often disparagingly referred to as "shotgun pleadings." The first published opinion to discuss shotgun pleadings in any meaningful way (albeit in a dissenting footnote) described the problem with shotgun pleadings under the federal rules. See T.D.S. Inc. v. Shelby Mut. Ins. Co., 760 F.2d 1520 (11th Cir.1985). The footnote, which began by quoting Rules 8(a)(2) and 10(b), commented:

The purpose of these rules is self-evident, to require the pleader to present his claims distinctly, so that, his adversary can discern what he is claiming and frame a responsive defense. The court can determine which facts support which claims and whether the plaintiff has stated claims upon which relief can be granted, and, at trial, the court can determine that evidence is relevant and that which is not. "Shotgun" pleadings, calculated to confuse the "enemy," the court, so that theories for relief not provided by law and which can prejudice an opportunity especially before the jury, can be masked, are flatly forbidden by the spirit, if not the letter, of the rules.

That footnote described the complaint at issue in T.D.S. as "a paradigmatic shotgun pleading containing a variety of contract and tort claims interwoven in a haphazard fashion."

T.D.S. was this Court's first shot in what was to become a thirty-year salvo of critical opinions on shotgun pleadings, and there is no ceasefire in sight. Some of our shooting, which has been done with nonlethal dicta, has at times been nearly as lacking in precision as the shotgun itself. At times we have used the term "shotgun pleading" to mean little more than a poorly drafted complaint." In the hope that we could impose some clarity on what we have been doing about unclear complaints, we have examined more than sixty published decisions since the T.D.S. decision in 1985. One thing we looked for is how many types of shotgun pleadings have been used, wittingly or unwittingly, by attorneys and litigants.

Though the groupings cannot be too finely drawn, we have identified four roughly distinct categories of shotgun pleadings. The most common type—by a long shot—is one containing multiple counts where each count adopts the allegations of all preceding counts, causing each successive count to carry all that came before and the last count to be a combination of the entire complaint. The next most common type, at least according to the published opinions on the subject reflect, is a complaint that does not commit the plaintiff to re-alleging all preceding counts but is guilty of the venial sin of being replete with vague, and immaterial facts not obviously connected to any particular cause of action. A third type of shotgun pleading is one that commits the sin of not separating into a different count for each cause of action or claim for relief. Fourth, and finally, there is the relatively rare situation of multiple claims against multiple defendants without specifying which of the defendants is responsible for which acts or omissions, or which of the defendants the claim is brought against. The unifying characteristic of all types of shotgun pleadings is that they fail to identify them and the grounds upon which each claim rests.

The district court dismissed Weiland's § 1983 claims against Johnson and Fleming because those contained in counts one and three of the complaint, because those counts: (1) incorporated the factual allegations contained in paragraphs 1 through 49 inclusive"; and (2) failed to identify which allegations are relevant to the elements of which legal theories" and "which constitutional amendments govern which counts." The court dismissed those claims even though it failed to determine from the complaint that Weiland had stated a claim for relief against the two deputies under the Fourth Amendment and for conspiracy to violate his constitutional rights.

Its reasoning for dismissing with prejudice claims that it could discern from the complaint was that it had given Weiland an opportunity to replead his complaint, and his amended pleadings “duplicated the violations of Rule 8(a)(2) and 10(b) which formed the basis of the court’s earlier dismissal of those counts.”

Weiland’s re-alleging of paragraphs 1 through 49 at the beginning of each count looks, at first glance, like the most common type of shotgun pleading. But it is not. As we have already discussed, this Court has condemned the incorporation of preceding paragraphs where a complaint “contains several counts, each one incorporating by reference the allegations of its predecessors [i.e., predecessor counts], leading to a situation where most of the counts (i.e., all but the first) contain irrelevant factual allegations and legal conclusions.” What we have here is different. The allegations of each count are not rolled into every successive count on down the line.

More importantly, this is not a situation where a failure to more precisely parcel out and identify the facts relevant to each claim materially increased the burden of understanding the factual allegations underlying each count. This may explain why the defendants did not move for a more definite statement under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(e) or otherwise assert that they were having difficulty knowing what they were alleged to have done and why they were liable for doing it. And it may also explain why the district court could and did understand the claims that were stated in these two counts.

Count one claims that Fleming and Johnson, “while acting under color of law,” violated Weiland’s constitutional rights by “using excessive and unreasonable force.” The task of figuring out which of the 49 paragraphs that are incorporated into count one are relevant to a claim of “excessive and unreasonable force” is hardly a task at all. It is greatly simplified by the organization of the 49 paragraphs of factual allegations into three subsections, the first of which is titled “Facts Surrounding the Shooting of [Christopher Weiland]” and consists of 23 paragraphs spanning just over six pages. This subsection is over-inclusive for purposes of an excessive force claim (the final 10 paragraphs are about the role the deputies played in the alleged coverup, which is not an element of excessive force). But the first 13 paragraphs clearly and concisely describe the events of April 6, 2007, from the 911 call to the shooting, tasering, beating, and arrest of Weiland. Count one is not a model of efficiency or specificity, but it does adequately put Fleming and Johnson on notice of the specific claims against them and the factual allegations that support those claims.

Count three—the conspiracy count—restates in paragraphs 69 through 74 the facts relevant to a conspiracy claim against Fleming and Johnson, including the allegations that Fleming and Johnson agreed to “fabricate an elaborate story” that would justify their use of deadly force and, in furtherance of that agreement, falsified police reports and tampered with evidence. According to count three, the deputies’ conspiracy resulted in the deprivation of multiple constitutional rights. As we will explain, only one of those alleged deprivations yields a cognizable claim, but for present purposes, it is enough to say that count three, like count one, gives Fleming and Johnson adequate notice of the claims against them and the factual allegations that support those claims.

Finally, we disagree with the district court's characterization of Weiland's complaint as failing to "state a claim upon which relief can be granted" because it fails to identify which constitutional amendments govern which counts." The complaint fails to identify the constitutional amendment or amendments that govern each count. The fact that he fails to identify the constitutional amendments under which he is not entitled to relief would be dispositive under Rule 12(b)(6) analysis, but it is not dispositive of the separate question of whether the allegations in this complaint are so poorly pleaded that they warrant a dismissal under Rule 10(b) regardless of whether they state viable claims. A dismissal under Rules 8(a)(1) and 10(b) is appropriate where "it is virtually impossible to know which allegations of fact are true and which are false, and it is equally impossible to determine which claim(s) for relief." No such virtual impossibility exists in this case.

For these reasons, we conclude that the district court abused its discretion when it dismissed Weiland's count one and count three claims against Fleming and Johnson on the grounds that those counts did not comply with Rules 8(a)(2) and 10(b). In concluding that the court should have dismissed those two counts, we are not retreating from this circuit's criticism of Rule 12(b)(6) pleadings, but instead are deciding that, whatever their faults, these two counts are sufficiently well-pleaded to permit a court to readily determine if they state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The district court implicitly recognized as much when it observed in its order dismissing counts one and three that they actually do state claims upon which relief can be granted.

2.2 Showing an Entitlement to Relief

A defending party may challenge the sufficiency of a claim under Rule 8(a)(2) with a motion to dismiss for failing to "state a claim upon which relief can be granted". Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 12(b)(6). A claim may be dismissed on either factual or legal insufficiency:

- A claim is factually insufficient if the facts alleged, even assuming they are true, would not satisfy the requirements of a claim. For example, if a plaintiff asserts a claim for negligence, but fails to allege any injury resulting from the defendant's conduct, the claim would be factually insufficient, because injury is a necessary element of a negligence claim.
- A claim is legally insufficient if the law does not recognize the purported claim at all. For example, if a plaintiff sues for "tortious bad taste in music", alleging that the defendant incessantly played "We Built This City" by The Starship and "Rockstar" by Nickelback, the claim would be legally insufficient, because the law in most states doesn't recognize any such claim.

In Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957), the Supreme Court interpreted Rule 8(a)(2) to establish a "no set of facts sufficient to support the claim" pleading standard, requiring only that the plaintiff "give the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests," without the necessity for detailed factual allegations. This standard rested on the original intent of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, under which the assertion of claims and the disclosure of facts are treated as separate phases of a suit. At the pleading stage, "a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." The discovery rules then give the parties an opportunity to establish the facts in full.

A half-century later, a pair of Supreme Court decisions jettisoned the Conley "no set of facts" standard and adopted a more demanding approach.

1. Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007)

In Twombly, the plaintiffs alleged that four telecommunications companies had "engaged in a contract, combination or conspiracy to prevent competitive entry in their respective local telephone and/or high speed internet services markets by, among other things, agreeing not to compete with one another and to stifle attempts by others to compete with them and otherwise allocating customers and markets to one another in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1." In support of that claim, the complaint alleged that the defendants "engaged in parallel conduct" to restrict competition, including "making unfair agreements with [competing providers] for access to [the defendants'] networks, providing inferior connections to the networks, overcharging, and billing in ways designed to sabotage the [competing providers'] relations with their own customers." The complaint also alleged that the defendants agreed to refrain from competing with one another, by not pursuing business opportunities in markets already serviced by other defendants.

In the absence of any meaningful competition between [the defendants] in one another's markets, and in light of the parallel course of conduct that each engaged in to prevent competition from [other providers] within their respective local telephone and/or high speed internet services markets and the other facts and market circumstances alleged above, Plaintiffs allege upon information and belief that Defendants have entered into a contract, combination or conspiracy to prevent competitive entry in their respective local telephone and/or high speed internet services markets and have agreed not to compete with one another and otherwise allocated customers and markets to one another.

The Court held that the allegations in the complaint were insufficient to state a claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act, which requires proof of a "contract, combination, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce".

A plaintiffs obligation to provide the "grounds" of his "entitlement to relief" requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level, on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true (even if doubtful in fact).

An allegation of parallel conduct and a bare assertion of conspiracy will not suffice. Without more, parallel conduct does not suggest conspiracy, and a conclusory allegation of agreement at some unidentified point does not supply facts adequate to show illegality. Hence, when allegations of parallel conduct are set out in order to make a § 1 claim, they must be placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action."

To assess whether the inference of an agreement was plausible, the majority considered "an obvious alternative explanation": While the alleged parallel conduct was "consistent with conspiracy," it was, in the majority's view, "as much in line with a wide swath of rational and competitive business strategy unilaterally prompted by common perceptions of the market." Finding that "the plaintiffs here have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible," the majority concluded that "their complaint must be dismissed."

2. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009)

Javed Iqbal sued various federal government officials, including former Attorney General John Ashcroft and FBI Director Robert Mueller, over his arrest and detention as a "a person 'of high interest' to the September 11 investigation". Iqbal, a citizen of Pakistan and a Muslim, alleged that Ashcroft and Mueller "adopted an unconstitutional policy that subjected him to harsh conditions of confinement on account of his race, religion, or national origin."

The complaint contends that petitioners designated respondent a person of high interest on account of his race, religion, or national origin, in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution. The complaint alleges that “the FBI, under the direction of Defendant MUELLER, arrested and detained thousands of Arab Muslim men as part of its investigation of the events of September 11.” It further alleges that “the policy of holding post-September-11th detainees in highly restrictive conditions of confinement until they were ‘cleared’ by the FBI was approved by Defendants ASHCROFT and MUELLER in discussions during the weeks after September 11, 2001.” Lastly, the complaint posits that petitioners “each knew of, or intended, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject” respondent to harsh conditions of confinement “as a result of policy, solely on account of his religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate purpose of public interest.” The pleading names Ashcroft as the “principal architect” of the policy, and identifies Mueller as “instrumental in its adoption, promulgation, and implementation.”

Iqbal’s claims were based on Bivens v. Six Unknown Fed. Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971):

In Bivens—proceeding on the theory that a right suggests a remedy—this Court “recognized for the first time an implied private action for damages against federal officers alleged to have violated constitutional rights.”

In the limited settings where Bivens does apply, the implied cause of action is the “federal analog to the cause of action brought against state officials under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.” Based on the rules our precedents have established, respondent correctly concedes that Government officials may not be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior. Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to Bivens and § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government official, through the official’s own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.

The factors necessary to establish a Bivens violation will vary with the constitutional provision involved. Where the claim is invidious discrimination in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments, the Supreme Court’s decisions make clear that the plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendant acted with discriminatory purpose. To state a claim based on a violation of a clearly established right, respondent must plead sufficient factual matter to show that petitioners adopted and implemented the detention policies at issue for a neutral, investigative reason but for the purpose of discriminating on account of race, religion, or national origin.

The Court reiterated the standard adopted in Twombly:

Rule 8 does not require “detailed factual allegations,” but it demands more than an unadorned, the defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation. A pleading that offers “labels and conclusions” or “a recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.” Nor does a complaint suffice if it tends only to invoke Rule 8’s demand for “factual support” for legal conclusions. Factual assertions “devoid of ‘further factual enhancement.’”

To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to “state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.” A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. The plausibility standard is not akin to a “probability requirement,” but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. Where a complaint pleads facts that are “merely consistent with” a defendant’s liability, it “stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility and ‘entitlement to relief.’”

Two working principles underlie our decision in Twombly. First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice. Rule 8 does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions. Second, a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. Determining whether complaint states a plausible claim for relief will, as the Court of Appeals observed, be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged—but it has not “shown”—“that the pleader is entitled to relief.” Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2).

In keeping with these principles a court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.

Applying that standard to Iqbal’s complaint, the majority concluded that the allegations were insufficient to state Bivins claims against Ashcroft and Mueller.

We begin our analysis by identifying “the allegations in the complaint that are not entitled to the assumption of truth. Respondent pleads that petitioners “knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject him” to harsh conditions of confinement “as a matter of policy, solely on account of his religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest.” The complaint alleges that Ashcroft was the “principal architect” of this invidious policy, and that Mueller was “instrumental” in adopting and executing it. These bare assertions, much like the pleading of conspiracy in Twombly, amount to nothing more than a “formulaic recitation of the elements” of a constitutional discrimination claim, namely, that petitioners adopted a policy “because of,” not merely ‘in spite of,’ its adverse effects upon an identifiable group.” As such, the allegations are conclusory and not entitled to be assumed true. To be clear, we do not reject these bald allegations on the ground that they are unrealistic or nonsensical. We do not so characterize them any more than the Court in Twombly rejected the plaintiffs’ express allegation of a “contract, combination or conspiracy to prevent competitive entry,” because it thought that claim too chimerical to be maintained. It is the conclusory nature of respondent’s allegations, rather than their extravagantly fanciful nature, that disentitles them to the presumption of truth.

We next consider the factual allegations in respondent’s complaint to determine if they plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief. The complaint alleges that “the FBI, under the direction of Defendant MUELLER, arrested and detained thousands of Arab Muslim men as part of its investigation of the events of September 11.” It further claims that “the policy of holding post-September-11th detainees in highly restrictive conditions of confinement until they were ‘cleared’ by the FBI was approved by Defendants ASHCROFT and MUELLER in discussions in the weeks after September 11, 2001.” Taken as true, these allegations are consistent with petitioners’ purposefully designating detainees “of high interest” because of their race, religion, or national origin. But given more likely explanations, they do not plausibly establish this purpose.

The September 11 attacks were perpetrated by 19 Arab Muslim hijackers who counted themselves members in good standing of al Qaeda, an Islamic fundamentalist group. Al Qaeda was headed by another Arab Muslim—Osama bin Laden—and composed in large part of his Arab Muslim disciples. It should come as no surprise that a legitimate policy directing law enforcement to arrest and detain individuals because of their suspected link to the attacks would produce a disparate, incidental impact on Arab Muslims, even though the purpose of the policy was to target neither Arabs nor Muslims. On the facts respondent alleges the arrests Mueller oversaw were likely lawful and justified by his nondiscriminatory intent to detain aliens who were illegally present in the United States and who had potential connections to those who committed terrorist acts. As between that “obvious alternative explanation” for the arrests, and the purposeful, invidious discrimination respondent asks us to infer, discrimination is not a plausible conclusion.

But even if the complaint’s well-pleaded facts give rise to a plausible inference that respondent’s arrest was the result of unconstitutional discrimination, that inference alone would not entitle respondent to relief. It is important to recall that respondent’s complaint challenges neither the constitutionality of his arrest nor his initial detention. Respondent’s constitutional claims against petitioners rest solely on their ostensible

"policy of holding post-September-11th detainees" in the [maximum security special housing unit] were categorized as "of high interest." To prevail on that theory, the complaint must contain facts showing that petitioners purposefully adopted a policy of classifying post-September-11 detainees "of high interest" because of their race, religion, or national origin.

This the complaint fails to do. Though respondent alleges that various other defendants, who are not us, may have labeled him a person "of high interest" for impermissible reasons, his only factual allegation against petitioners accuses them of adopting a policy approving "restrictive conditions of confinement" for post-September-11 detainees until they were "cleared" by the FBI.¹ Accepting the truth of that allegation, the complaint does not show, or even intimate, that petitioners purposefully housed detainees in the SHU due to their race, religion, or national origin. All it plausibly suggests is that the National Security Agency, enforcement officers, in the aftermath of a devastating terrorist attack, sought to keep suspected terrorists in the most secure conditions available until the suspects could be cleared of terrorist activity. Respondent does not argue, nor can he, that such a motive would violate petitioners' constitutional obligations. Petitioners need to allege more by way of factual content to "nudge" his claim of purposeful discrimination "a few steps" from conceivable to plausible.²

Woods v. City of Greensboro, 855 F.3d 639 (4th Cir., 2017)

DAVIS, Senior Circuit Judge:

Racial stigmas and stereotypes are not impairing unless we internalize them. And there is no reason for us to do that when we know that the history of black culture in America is one of reaffirming. We may live in a society that will only grudgingly and inconsistently accept our equality, but that does not mean that we must live as if we are victims. I understand that avoiding the effects of racial stigmas and stereotyping is not always easy because research has shown that most people harbor implicit biases and even well-intentioned people unknowingly act on racist attitudes. However, this merely confirms that we alone cannot bear the burden of ameliorating racism in our country. This responsibility must be assumed by all good people without regard to race, sex, and ethnicity.

This appeal requires us to consider whether it is plausible to believe that, in twenty-first century America, a municipal government may seek to contract with a minority-owned entity under some conditions, yet, on account of race, avoid contracting with a minority-owned entity under other conditions.

In April 2013, Black Network Television Ad Agency, LLC ("BNT"), a minority-owned television network, was granted and then subsequently denied a $300,000 economic development loan application from the City of Greensboro, North Carolina ("the City"), prompting BNT to file suit, asserting a claim, among others, for racial discrimination pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1981. The City argued, in support of its motion to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim, that relief could be granted, that its willingness to grant BNT a loan fully secured by a senior lien on the personal residence of BNT's principals, notwithstanding its unwillingness to grant BNT a loan fully secured by a third-position lien on that residence, foreclosed a cause of action.

discrimination as a matter of law. BNT responded that, to the contrary, the City's refusal to make the loan was based upon stereotypes about the risk of lending to a minority business and that, at the pleading stage, its allegations suggesting the pretextual character of the City's explanation for the denial of the loan are sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). The district court agreed with the City's arguments, concluded that BNT's factual allegations were so insubstantial as to render its claim implausible, and therefore dismissed the complaint with prejudice.

We hold that the district court's crabbed plausibility analysis misinterpreted and misapplied the controlling pleading standard. The key issue in this case is not whether the City would contract with a minority-owned business, but whether the City would contract with BNT on the same conditions and under substantially the same circumstances as it would with a nonminority-owned business. Because BNT has plausibly pled that the conditions under which the City was willing to grant it a loan were more stringent than those the City applied to similarly situated white-owned applicants, we conclude that the district court erred in dismissing BNT's claim of discrimination at the pleading stage. Accordingly, for the reasons explained within, we reverse the district court's order dismissing this action and remand for further proceedings.

We begin by summarizing the cardinal facts surrounding BNT's application for, and the City's ultimate denial of, the economic development loan. Throughout, we consider as true all well-pleaded allegations in the complaint, matters of public record, and documents attached to the motion to dismiss that are integral to the complaint and of unquestioned authenticity.

In April 2013, members of the City's Economic and Business Development Office recommended that Michael and Ramona Woods (referred to by the parties, and hence herein, as "the Woods") submit an application for a $300,000 ten-year economic development loan for their company, BNT, as part of the City's economic development efforts. The Woods offered to secure the loan by way of a note and deed of trust to their home. On May 28, 2013, L.R. Appraisals, Inc., appraised the home at a value of $975,000.00 "resulting in equity well over the $300,000.00 loan, after consideration of all existing loans on the residence."

Pursuant to Greensboro Code of Ordinances Section 4.55, the City may make economic development loans only after receiving authorization from its nine-member elected City Council. On June 18, 2013, at a regularly scheduled meeting, the City Council considered a Resolution authorizing the City to enter into a loan agreement with BNT. The Resolution, which was drafted by the Greensboro City Attorney's office, stated that the City's interest would be secured by "no more than a second lien" on the real property and improvements. Assistant City Manager of Economic Development, Andy Scott, discussed with the City Council in open session the financial statements of the Woods and the collateral requirements of the proposed loan agreement and “stated [to the Council] that the City would be placed in the second on the residence being used as collateral.” The City Council voted seven to two adopting Resolution 172-13, which authorized the City to enter into an agreement for the $300,000 loan. The Resolution provided the following conditions:

WHEREAS, the borrower is required to confirm compliance with the following conditions at the City's loan closing to protect the public funds invested in the project;

2. City will complete a title search confirming no additional liens are outstanding on the 5018 Carlson Dairy Road property that will secure the City's loan beyond the first mortgage that is currently outstanding.
3. City will confirm that the first mortgage balance does not exceed $509,000.
4. City loan will be secured by a note and deed of trust with the City's interest secured by no more than a third lien on the real property and improvements located at 5018 Carlson Dairy Road.

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED BY THE CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF GREENSBORO, NC, that the City of Greensboro is hereby authorized to execute the necessary note and agreement with BNT Ad Agency LLC in accordance with the above terms and conditions.

As it turned out, in addition to a first mortgage, the Woods had a home equity line of credit on the property. The City informed the Woods that the Resolution would have to be modified to reflect that the City's security interest would be a third lien, rather than a second. On June 16, 2013, at a second meeting, the City Council considered modifying the Resolution. In the minutes, the following occurred:

Assistant City Manager of Economic Development Andy Scott summarized the difference between the approved loan at the June 18 council meeting and the modifications made in the resolution; and spoke to the financial assessment of the Woods' collateral in terms of repayment.

Council discussed the capped equity limits by Carolina Bank; referenced three previous loans the City had been in the third position; the desire to support minority owned small business; and concerns expressed about the City going from second to the third position in loan repayment. City Attorney Shah-Khan advised that if Council chose to move forward with the transaction, it would be necessary to comply with the changes with what Council was now aware of; and the decision was a policy matter for Council.

Mayor Perkins stated there were speakers to the item.

George Hartzman, stated there was not enough equity in the property to fund the city's portion of a potentially defaulted loan; and encouraged Council to respect their fiduciary responsibility to taxpayers.

Mr. Scott stated there was sufficient collateral in the house based on the appraisal to support the loan.

Ramona Woods stated she had not intended to not disclose her loan positions; commented on Ashtae Products' role in the Black Network Television; and provided a status report on the television show.

Mayor Perkins clarified that the former resolution stated that the City would not take a second mortgage.

The City Council then voted not to modify the Resolution to make a loan secured by a third position lien, but left in effect the original Resolution and its terms. Subsequently, on June 18, 2014, the City Council officially revoked the Resolution authorizing the City to enter into an agreement with BNT.

B.

The Woods and BNT filed suit in federal district court alleging violations of 42 U.S.C. §§ 1981, 1983, and 1986, the Equal Protection and Due Process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment and the North Carolina Constitution, as well as state law claims for breach of contract, civil conspiracy, and unfair and deceptive trade practices. The district court dismissed all of the Woods' and BNT's claims. The court dismissed all claims asserted against the City and the Councilmembers in their individual capacities on the basis of legislative immunity. The court dismissed the breach of contract, due process, conspiracy, and § 1986 claim for failure to state a cause of action.

The court considered together the plaintiffs' claims that the City discriminated against them on the basis of race by failing to modify the terms of the Resolution to provide BNT a loan. The court first concluded that the Woods and BNT did not have standing to assert discrimination claims on the alleged facts. The court also concluded that the plaintiffs failed to plausibly allege discrimination based upon race. Specifically, the court reasoned that the plaintiffs failed to allege the existence of valid comparators, which in its view was essential to allegations of intentional disparate treatment. The court also reasoned that it could not infer an intent to discriminate where "the initial Resolution was approved in part because Plaintiffs are minorities."

BNT, alone, timely appealed the court's dismissal of its claim that the City discriminated against it in violation of § 1981.

II.B.

We next review the district court's dismissal for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). We review dismissals under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) de novo.

As a preliminary matter, the parties dispute the correct pleading standard. BNT argues that it has sufficiently pleaded a race discrimination claim and that it was not required to plead a prima facie case. BNT relies on Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 510 (2002), which explained that the prima facie case is an "evidentiary standard, not a pleading requirement." The City does not dispute that BNT need not establish a prima facie case, but argues that BNT relies on a superseded pleading standard articulated in Conley v. Gibson.

In Swierkiewicz, the plaintiff alleged discrimination based on his age and national origin in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Swierkiewicz was a fifty-three-year-old Hungarian native employed by Sorema N.A. as a senior vice president and chief underwriting officer. According to Swierkiewicz, the CEO demoted him and gave many of his duties to a thirty-two-year-old French national. The district and appellate courts found that Swierkiewicz had not adequately alleged circumstances that support an inference of discrimination, but the Supreme Court held that "an employment discrimination plaintiff need not plead a prima facie case of discrimination to survive to dismiss,” because “the prima facie case is an evidentiary standard, not a requirement.” The Court explained that applying McDonnell Douglas to Rule 12(b)(6) would establish a “heightened pleading standard” in contravention of Rule 8(a)(2). In support, the Swierkiewicz Court cited the pleading standard as articulated in Compton, which required the plaintiff need only provide fair notice of what the claim is and upon which it rests.

In Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, the Supreme Court announced a new pleading standard. Twombly required that allegations must be more than conclusory. In addition, unadorned allegations must be sufficient “to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.” There must be “factual content” that provides the plaintiff with “a entitlement to relief.” The plaintiff must state “sufficient facts to state a claim that is ‘plausible on its face.’” This requires that the plaintiff’s allegations be more than “plead[] facts that are ‘merely consistent with’ a defendant’s liability;” the plaintiff must “allow[] the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.”

In Iqbal, the Court made clear that this heightened standard applied to all civil actions claims of discrimination. The Iqbal Court considered allegations that the discriminated against a Pakistani man detained by federal officials in New York City following the September 11 attacks. Iqbal brought claims against Attorney General John Ashcroft and FBI Director Robert Mueller, arguing that they had “adopted an unconstitutional policy that subjected Iqbal to harsh conditions of confinement on account of his race, religion, and national origin.” A majority of the Supreme Court deemed Iqbal’s claims of discrimination invalid in light of the fact that the September 11 attacks “were perpetrated by 19 Arab Muslims.” As between that ‘obvious alternative explanation’ for the arrests, and the purpose of discrimination respondent asks us to infer, discrimination is not a plausible conclusion. The allegations had “not ‘nudged his claims’ of invidious discrimination ‘across the line from conceivable to plausible,’”

Following the Supreme Court's decisions in Iqbal and Twombly, we of course have occasions to explicate the new pleading standards. We did so, for example, in an discrimination case, McCleary-Evans v. Maryland Department of Transportation, plaintiff, an African-American woman, alleged that a state agency discriminated when it refused to hire her. In support, she stated that she was a qualified applicant she was denied a position in favor of someone who was white. She did not offer any between herself and the individual who was hired. A majority of the panel found that Evans' allegations were fatally conclusory without additional facts to support inference that the decisionmakers were motivated by race. To be sure, the Court in Swierkiewicz remained binding precedent and the plaintiff was not required to establish a prima facie case of discrimination to survive a motion to dismiss. The court further reasoned, however, that a plaintiff is nonetheless "required to allege facts elements of a cause of action created by [the relevant] statute" in compliance with Twombly. Applying this standard, the McCleary-Evans Court wrote: "The defendant's decision to hire someone other than her, and the cause that she asks us to infer (i.e., invidious discrimination) is not plausible in light of the 'obvious alternative explanation' that the decisionmakers judged those hired to be more qualified and better suited for the positions."

The correct application of the above principles is straightforward. BNT need not plead facts sufficient to establish a prima facie case of race-based discrimination to survive a motion to dismiss, but as the City argues, the more stringent pleading standard established in Iqbal and Twombly applies, not the superseded standard that BNT cited in its brief.

Finally, we consider whether BNT has offered sufficient factual allegations to support a plausible claim that the City acted, pretextually, on the basis of insufficient security (or, perhaps put differently, on the basis of an arguably irrational insistence on taking a “second lien” position without regard for the level of security supporting the requested loan) or, instead, actually on the basis of race. At this stage, BNT need only allege sufficient “factual matter (taken as true) to suggest” a cognizable cause of action.

BNT argues that the City Council refused to modify the terms of the Resolution “to allow Defendant Greensboro to take a third, but fully secured, position” for discriminatory reasons. Unlike the allegations before the court in McCleary-Evans, BNT pleaded allegations beyond “a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully,” BNT’s allegations include (1) the results of a disparity study demonstrating a pattern of the City almost exclusively lending to nonminority-owned businesses; (2) facts which suggest that the Woods’ residence had sufficient equity to fully secure a third-position lien; and (3) examples of how the City has treated nonminority businesses differently, including taking a third-position lien in approving a loan to a nonminority corporation. Taken together, we hold that these allegations are more than sufficient to “nudge [BNT’s] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.”

First, BNT alleges that a June 2012 “Disparity Study for the Minority/Women Business Enterprise Program” demonstrates that of $92.4 million in economic development expenditures, less than $200,000—or .2%—was disbursed to minority businesses, despite the fact that the City is over 40% African-American. This Court may infer discriminatory intent from evidence of a general pattern of racial discrimination in the practices of a defendant. In this case, the June 2012 study of racial disparities in contracting by the City necessarily informs this Court’s “common sense” analysis of whether BNT’s allegations are plausible.

Second, BNT alleges that, as a practical matter, there was no difference in risk between a third-position lien and second-position lien because there was sufficient equity in the property to fully secure the City’s loan under either condition. This does not seem to be in dispute and, in fact, was stated in the open session during the July City Council meeting. But even if it could be disputed at some appropriate stage of these proceedings, this case had not arrived at that stage when the district court dismissed the case. We do not doubt that there may yet be sound, rational reasons why the City has insisted that it must take no worse than a second lien position in these circumstances, but again, that kind of factual exploration must await discovery and, if appropriate, summary judgment proceedings. However sound the City’s position may be, there is nothing self-evident on the face of the City’s position that is material to BNT’s claim of pretext.

Whether the City's nondiscriminatory explanation for rejecting the third-lien position is a pretext is a question to be analyzed under the long-familiar shifting burden of proof from McDonnell Douglas v. Green, and not under Rule 12(b)(6). Still, under Iqbal and Jordan, the Court must consider the plausibility of inferring discrimination based on BNT's allegations. In light of an "obvious alternative explanation" for the conduct. In other words, while BNT may establish a prima facie case at this stage, as discussed supra in Part II.B, we must be careful to ensure that the City's explanation for rejecting the loan does not render BNT's allegations implausible.

Viewed in the light most favorable to BNT, the operative complaint contains allegations which undermine the City's explanation for rejecting the loan, in particular the allegation that there was sufficient equity to secure the loan whether the second or third lien condition was met. The City has not yet disputed this allegation for it has yet to file its answer to the complaint. There may well be, of course, other reasons that the City decided to deny the loan, such as the City's unwillingness to change the terms of a resolution once it has been adopted, or perhaps the fact that BNT had failed to disclose important information, e.g., the existence of the third lien. The question is not whether there are more likely explanations for the City's action, but whether the City's impliedly proffered reason—that a third-position lien presented a risk—is so obviously an irrefutably sound and unambiguously nondiscriminatory pretextual explanation that it renders BNT's claim of pretext implausible. We discuss the weakness in the inferences to be drawn based on the factual allegations here.

Third, and even if the above considerations were deemed insufficient to nudge the City over the plausibility threshold, BNT actually alleges particular examples of how the City treated similarly situated white businesses differently. BNT alleges that the City accepted third-position liens as collateral in other contemporary deals with nonminority firms. Specifically, in 2013, the City Council voted to give an $850,000 loan to Kotis Holdings, a nonminority-owned company, which was secured by a third-place lien on a private residence.

BNT also alleges that the City was generally more willing to afford accommodations to non-African-American/Hispanic companies. According to BNT's allegations (taken together with the City's responses), the City provided nonminority company Gerbing a $125,000 grant without amending its resolution to create a new incentive program. In another example, Mel's Pressure Washing, a nonminority company, received $450,000 in business over a six-year period without any contract or a bid approval for the work that was done. In addition, BNT alleges that the City entered into other deals with nonminority businesses that had a history of default, and thereby greater default risks. For example, the City allegedly provided a $2,000,000 forgive-and-forget loan to a nonminority borrower, Self Help, as well as a second installment of $100,000 to the City's parking program, the City Parking Group, LLC, a nonminority company that had defaulted in the past. BNT also asserts that the City converted the nonminority-owned Nussbaum Center for Entrepreneurs' year $1,275,000 loan into a grant, despite the fact that it had defaulted on two initial installments. BNT asserts it had no such history or suggested risk of default, and that the City's refusal to amend its resolution, despite its continued willingness to work with defaulted nonminority businesses, evidences disparate treatment based on race. These allegations support an inference of disparate treatment at this stage.

There's yet more. BNT alleges that the City has backed out of commitments to other minority companies, but does not treat white companies this way. In support of this assertion, BNT alleges that in 2014, the City Council attempted to renege on a $1.5 million dollar loan given to the International Civil Rights Museum, relying on a technicality that the documents on the loan were never signed, despite the fact that the City had already paid out $750,000 of the loan. The Civil Rights Museum's interim Chairwoman, Deena Hayes, stated that "there seems to be a higher standard" when it comes to the City lending to African-American companies.

The district court reasoned that "many of the allegedly similarly situated businesses proffered by BNT are not valid comparators." The court further reasoned that the "specific security position of the City is a financial decision that is not immediately subject to drawing inferences of racial discrimination within the context of minority small-business promotion." This amounts to fact finding, not the conduct of a common sense plausibility analysis.

So viewed, we decline to credit this reasoning. While differences exist between the facts alleged in the case at bar and each of the comparative exemplars that BNT offers, as would be expected, evidentiary determinations regarding whether the comparators' features are sufficiently similar to constitute appropriate comparisons generally should not be made at this point. The similarly situated analysis typically occurs in the context of establishing a prima facie case of discrimination, not at the 12(b)(6) stage. At this point, BNT has pleaded sufficient facts to justify an inference, plausibly and reasonably indulged, that the City treated it differently from the way it has treated non-minority businesses under arguably similar circumstances, and that it did so on account of race.

Central to the district court's analysis was its conclusion that since "the initial Resolution was approved in part because [BNT's principals] are minorities, it is implausible that they were later denied a loan because of the same consideration." We disagree. We break no new ground in observing that it is not implausible that the City was willing to contract with BNT on one set of terms, but, on account of race, it was unwilling to contract with BNT on another set of terms, although nonminority firms might meet with approval under both regimes.

A claim similar to BNT's was recognized in Williams v. Staples, Inc. The plaintiff, Williams, brought a § 1981 claim of discrimination after he was prevented from purchasing a printer cartridge at a Staples office supply and photocopying store. When Williams presented a check, the clerk informed him that Staples did not accept out-of-state checks. Later that day, a white customer was permitted to make a purchase using an out-of-state check. The disparate treatment was replicated by a black and white tester. We concluded that Williams had presented sufficient evidence to establish that Staples's refusal to take his check was a pretext for unlawful discrimination in violation of § 1981, even though Staples would sell to black customers if they did not use checks. Invidious discrimination steeped in racial stereotyping is no less corrosive of the achievement of equality than invidious discrimination rooted in other mental states.

We have previously admonished district courts, albeit in unpublished, non-binding decisions, that imposing unique burdens or stereotypical expectations on an individual based on her membership in a protected group is illicit discrimination, even though the defendant does not discriminate consistently against every woman or minority under all conditions. We note that the time when that admonishment should be given precedential force.

It is well established that an actor may consider another individual's race or gender as a factor in some circumstances but a motivation for unlawful discrimination in other circumstances. Indeed, it is unlikely today that an actor would explicitly discriminate under all circumstances. It is much more likely that, where discrimination occurs, it does so in the context of many decisions that can be explained based upon reasons other than illicit bias, whether explicit or perhaps implicit, is no less intentional. While a company may generally seek to hire women, it may also unfairly deny women positions once they become pregnant. While a college may affirmatively recruit minority students, the race of a student may simultaneously lead to increased scrutiny when the individual has a disciplinary record. And while a lender may generally offer loans to African-American applicants, it may also view African-American borrowers as less creditworthy and more challenging risks than similarly situated white borrowers under similar conditions.

In reaching our conclusion, we note that discrimination claims are particularly susceptible to premature dismissal because civil rights plaintiffs often plead facts that are considered both legal and illegal behavior, and civil rights cases are more likely to suffer from the problem of asymmetry, pre-discovery. There is thus a real risk that legitimate discrimination claims, particularly claims based on more subtle theories of stereotyping or implicit bias, will be dismissed should a judge substitute his or her view of the likely reason for a particular claim in place of the controlling plausibility standard. Such an approach especially traps a plaintiff in doctrinal quicksand when it is undertaken without the benefit of a developed theory that is essential to the substantiation or refutation of common sense allegations of discrimination. Affirmance of the dismissal of the complaint in this case, while it may not establish numerous factual allegations beyond conclusory recitals of law, would establish a dangerous precedent that would inevitably lead to the premature dismissal of a host of other potentially valid discrimination claims where plaintiffs offer fulsome allegations similar to those involved in this case here.

"A well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of every fact asserted in the complaint is improbable, and 'that a recovery is very remote and unlikely.'" Manifesto of the Court of Appeals in Iqbal/Twombly was not intended to serve as a federal court door-closing mechanism for all weak cases, even assuming this case fits the description of "arguably weak." Whether a plaintiff can have a difficult time establishing the merits of its claim is of little import now. The question before us is "not whether [the defendant] will ultimately prevail' but whether the plaintiff's complaint was sufficient to cross the federal court's threshold." We conclude simply that BNT offered sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." No more was required of BNT to state a claim, and no more is required of us to so hold.

WILKINSON, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

If ever there were a case that failed to satisfy the plausibility standard on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, it is this one. BNT presents nothing more than bare speculation that racial discrimination influenced the City's treatment of its loan application. To the contrary, the minority-owned status of the business motivated the City to extend the loan in the first place. The complaint manifests that nothing but prudent, neutral, non-racial lending practices were at issue here. The dismissal was absolutely justified and I would affirm the district court.

I.

The majority ignores the whole point of Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, and Ashcroft v. Iqbal. Those two decisions make clear that a well-pleaded complaint must allege "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." In other words, "factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." This "requires more than labels and conclusions," because the court must be able to "draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable of the misconduct alleged." And as relevant here, a claim may fail to reach this threshold if some "obvious alternative explanation" exists.

The distinction that Twombly and Iqbal draw between plausibility and mere possibility means this: in cases where there is no more than bald conjecture of impermissible animus, the claim should be dismissed at the pleading stage. Discovery is an expensive and cumbersome process that parties should not frivolously be forced to undertake. "So, when the allegations in a complaint, however true, could not raise a claim of entitlement to relief, this basic deficiency should be exposed at the point of minimum expenditure of time and money by the parties and the court."

BNT has not met even the most permissive reading of these pleading requirements.

II.

There can be no mistake that the City in fact approved BNT's request for a loan. Michael and Ramona Woods, the owners of BNT, "discussed with various City of Greensboro officials what a successful minority owned Greensboro-based television network would mean to the Greensboro community." It is undisputed that City officials actually "suggested and recommended" that BNT apply for funding to facilitate production of its situational comedy, "Whatcha Cookin." City officials then assisted BNT in framing the loan application, and the City Council later discussed "the desire to support minority owned small businesses." In both word and deed, the City encouraged BNT's endeavor.

The City, however, conditioned its approval of the loan on a number of factors. These included a title search confirming that there were no liens beyond the first mortgage on the property that secured the loan, that the current mortgage debt out-standing on that collateral did not exceed $509,000, and that the City's interest in the collateral would be prioritized at no worse than a second lien. BNT failed to meet these conditions and petitioned the City to amend the specified terms, which the City refused to do. Although BNT alleges that it was unable to obtain a loan due to racial discrimination, an "obvious alternative explanation" for the City's action is immediately clear from the face of the complaint. BNT simply did not satisfy prudent, neutral, non-racial loan conditions for eight months while the loan resolution was in place.

BNT alleges no direct evidence of racial bias, nor does it assert that any such evidence was inferred. Instead, BNT searches under bushes to propose additional facts from which animus can be inferred. BNT argues that there was sufficient equity in the collateral to secure the loan regardless of whether the City assumed a second or third lien. BNT also claims that the City provided larger loans under equally or less favorable conditions to non-minority borrowers for reasons, therefore, that the only remaining explanation for why it was unable to obtain a loan was presumptively discrimination. I disagree. This is the very type of baseless pleading that the Supreme Court in Iqbal were meant to foreclose.

Home values, like any investment, can be volatile. Any lender knows the difference between being first, second and third lien: being second in line is better than being third. The City should have known that it would wish to wait behind two other outstretched hands in the event of a default. Recovery of a loan is never entirely certain. And BNT further overlooks that the Woods, who had no title to the collateral, failed even to convey to the City the true nature and amount of their debt to them in the first place. Both parties encouraged the district court to consider the City Council minutes concerning the loan. These minutes show that the City was unaware of the pre-existing liens on the property that was offered as security. Ramona Woods responded to the City's inquiry that "she had not intended to not disclose her loan positions." But the City cannot be faulted for refusing to amend the terms of a loan upon finding that the collateral was more encumbered both in the number and total debt obligation of out-standing liens, than the City had been led to believe.

The district court correctly observed that "the specific security position of the City is not relevant to the decision that is not immediately subject to drawing inferences of racial discrimination." Assuming that BNT could establish every fact alleged in the complaint, it would still be insufficient to plausibly support a finding of unlawful animus.

Although BNT references numerous other loans approved by the City, these loans do not provide a plausible route by which BNT can establish discriminatory intent. Whether a loan to a particular comparator is a legal conclusion for which the parties are not entitled to deference is not a question that can be decided at the pleading stage. The district court was quite correct to note that the provided examples of loans that "involve either grant money, rather than loan money, City Council decisions that are made before a loan has been disbursed, or a differently constituted City Council." These comparators are so far afield that almost any approval of a loan to a non-minority borrower would subject the City to a lawsuit.

BNT makes mention of an $850,000 loan made by the City to Kotis Holdings in 2010. It argues that this loan, secured by a third lien and nearly three times the size of the loan requested, is evidence that BNT was denied its loan due to racial bias.

But BNT forgets that the Kotis loan was part of a new incentive program offered to a developer, not an economic development loan to a private business for goods and services. In other words, these loans differed in kind. BNT also failed to provide any indication of the amount of available equity in the asset that secured the Kotis loan, which would have been necessary to establish a comparison. Moreover, the Kotis loan was initially approved without any consideration of race, whereas the City likely felt misled when BNT asked to renegotiate the basic terms of the loan after the loan was approved.

The majority surmises that BNT just might somehow conceivably manage to prevail. Yet the complaint itself makes clear that basic, elemental lending prudence was at work here. “As between that ‘obvious alternative explanation’ and the purposeful, invidious discrimination [the plaintiff] asks us to infer, discrimination is not a plausible conclusion.” Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 682. BNT has therefore “not nudged its claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.” Even assuming all the facts alleged, BNT “stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility,” and fails to present “more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully”.

III.

The majority is certainly right that racial prejudice in this society is persistent and that its modern incarnation may take more subtle forms. There is another side to this story, however, which Twombly and Iqbal serve to underscore. Promiscuous accusations of racial prejudice, as exemplified by this complaint, are diminishing the perceived gravity of those unfortunate situations where racial discrimination must be confronted and still does occur. Careless racial accusations carry a distinctive sting and visit an especial hurt that serves only to estrange and separate: Americans will eschew racial interactions that carry a risk of accusation when no unlawful animus is afoot. Allowing complaints such as this to go forward trivializes, sadly, the imperishable values our civil rights laws embody. A separatism born of unfounded accusations and pervasive racial attributions cannot be the society to which I or my fine colleagues in the majority aspire.

Courts should respect responsible decisionmaking rather than strip cities of sound lending practices just because a party injects race into the equation. It is no secret that municipal budgets are severely strained: the City should be respected both for seeking to extend a loan to BNT and for refusing to amend the associated conditions when, unexpectedly, its lien position turned more precarious.

The City Council minutes reveal that being a minority business was a plus here. The City openly wished to grant this loan to BNT and went to great lengths to help BNT prepare the loan application. The fact that the loan was actually approved shows that it was something the City wanted to do. BNT now faults the City for following sound and accepted lending practices. It would appear that no good deed goes unpunished: clichés, as the saying goes, sometimes become clichés because they are true.

3. Answers and Defenses

Fed. R. Civ. P Rule 8

(b) Defenses; Admissions and Denials.

(1) In General. In responding to a pleading, a party must:

(A) state in short and plain terms its defenses to each claim asserted against it;

(B) admit or deny the allegations asserted against it by an opposing party.

(2) Denials—Responding to the Substance. A denial must fairly respond to the allegation.

(3) General and Specific Denials. A party that intends in good faith to deny all the allegations of a pleading—including the jurisdictional grounds—may do so by a general denial. A party that does not intend to deny all the allegations must either specifically deny the allegations or generally deny all except those specifically admitted.

(4) Denying Part of an Allegation. A party that intends in good faith to deny one part of an allegation must admit the part that is true and deny the rest.

(5) Lacking Knowledge or Information. A party that lacks knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief about the truth of an allegation must so state, and that statement has the effect of a denial.

(6) Effect of Failing to Deny. An allegation—other than one relating to the amount of damages—is admitted if a responsive pleading is required and the allegation is denied. If a responsive pleading is not required, an allegation is considered denied or avoided.

(c) Affirmative Defenses.

(1) In General. In responding to a pleading, a party must affirmatively state any affirmative defense, including:

- accord and satisfaction;
- arbitration and award;
- assumption of risk;
- contributory negligence;
- duress;
- estoppel;
- failure of consideration;
- fraud;
- illegality;
- injury by fellow servant;
- laches;
- license;
- payment;

- release;
- res judicata;
- statute of frauds;
- statute of limitations; and
- waiver.

(2) Mistaken Designation. If a party mistakenly designates a defense as a counterclaim, or a counterclaim as a defense, the court must, if justice requires, treat the pleading as though it were correctly designated, and may impose terms for doing so.

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 12

(a) Time to Serve a Responsive Pleading.

(1) In General. Unless another time is specified by this rule or a federal statute, the time for serving a responsive pleading is as follows:

(A) A defendant must serve an answer:

(i) within 21 days after being served with the summons and complaint; or

(ii) if it has timely waived service under Rule 4(d), within 60 days after the request for a waiver was sent, or within 90 days after it was sent to the defendant outside any judicial district of the United States.

(B) A party must serve an answer to a counterclaim or crossclaim within 21 days after being served with the pleading that states the counterclaim or crossclaim.

(C) A party must serve a reply to an answer within 21 days after being served with an order to reply, unless the order specifies a different time.

(4) Effect of a Motion. Unless the court sets a different time, serving a motion under this rule alters these periods as follows:

(A) if the court denies the motion or postpones its disposition until trial, the responsive pleading must be served within 14 days after notice of the court's action; or

(B) if the court grants a motion for a more definite statement, the responsive pleading must be served within 14 days after the more definite statement is served.

(b) How to Present Defenses. Every defense to a claim for relief in any pleading must be asserted in the responsive pleading if one is required. But a party may assert the following defenses by motion:

- (1) lack of subject-matter jurisdiction;
- (2) lack of personal jurisdiction;

- (3) improper venue;
- (4) insufficient process;
- (5) insufficient service of process;
- (6) failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted; and
- (7) failure to join a party under Rule 19.

A motion asserting any of these defenses must be made before pleading if a response is allowed. If a pleading sets out a claim for relief that does not require a responsive pleading, the opposing party may assert at trial any defense to that claim. No defense or objection may be asserted at trial without first joining it with one or more other defenses or objections in a responsive pleading or motion.

(c) Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings. After the pleadings are closed—but earlier than the date set for trial or before the trial begins—any party may move for judgment on the pleadings.

(d) Result of Presenting Matters Outside the Pleadings. If, on a motion under Rule 12(c), matters outside the pleadings are presented to and not excluded by the court, they must be treated as one for summary judgment under Rule 56. All parties must have a reasonable opportunity to present all the material that is pertinent to the motion.

(e) Motion for a More Definite Statement. A party may move for a more definite statement if the pleading to which a responsive pleading is allowed but which is so vague or ambiguous that the party cannot reasonably prepare a response. The motion must be made before filing a responsive pleading and must point out the defects complained of and the details desired. If the court grants the motion, the party must file a more definite statement and the order is not obeyed within 14 days after notice of the order, the court may strike the pleading or issue any other appropriate order.

(f) Motion to Strike. The court may strike from a pleading an insufficient defense, a redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter. The court may act:

- (1) on its own; or

- (2) on motion made by a party either before responding to the pleading or, if a response is allowed, within 21 days after being served with the pleading.

(g) Joining Motions.

(1) Right to Join. A motion under this rule may be joined with any other motion under this rule.

(2) Limitation on Further Motions. Except as provided in Rule 12(h)(2) or

(3) a party that makes a motion under this rule must not make another motion under this rule raising a defense or objection that was available to the party but omitted from this motion.

(h) Waiving and Preserving Certain Defenses.

(1) When Some Are Waived. A party waives any defense listed in Rule 12(b)(2)–(5) by:

(A) omitting it from a motion in the circumstances described in Rule 12(g)(2); or

(B) failing to either:

(i) make it by motion under this rule; or

(ii) include it in a responsive pleading or in an amendment allowed by Rule 15(a)(1) as a matter of course.

(2) When to Raise Others. Failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, to join a person required by Rule 19(b), or to state a legal defense to a claim may be raised:

(A) in any pleading allowed or ordered under Rule 7(a);

(B) by a motion under Rule 12(c); or

(C) at trial.

(3) Lack of Subject-Matter Jurisdiction. If the court determines at any time that it lacks subject-matter jurisdiction, the court must dismiss the action.

(i) Hearing Before Trial. If a party so moves, any defense listed in Rule 12(b)(1)–(7)—whether made in a pleading or by motion—and a motion under Rule 12(c) must be heard and decided before trial unless the court orders a deferral until trial.

Reis Robotics, USA, Inc. v. Concept Industries, Inc., 462 F.Supp.2d 897 (N.D. Ill. 2006)

CASTILLO, District Court.

This is a diversity action governed by Illinois law in which Plaintiff Reis Robotics USA, Inc. (“Reis”) filed a complaint against Defendant Concept Industries, Inc. (“Concept”), seeking redress for breach of contract. Concept has answered the complaint, asserted six affirmative defenses, and brought seven counterclaims against Reis. Reis now moves to strike and dismiss Concept’s affirmative defenses; strike portions of Concept’s answer; and dismiss Concept’s counterclaims. For the reasons set forth below, Reis’s motions are granted in part and denied in part.

BACKGROUND

1. Reis’s Allegations

The following facts are taken from Reis’s complaint. Reis, an Illinois corporation, manufactures and supplies industrial robotics equipment. Concept, a Michigan corporation, manufactures and supplies automotive parts. On or about February 24, 2005, the parties entered into a contractual arrangement for Concept to purchase from Reis a robotic laser cutting machine (the “Laser”) and associated fixtures for trimming three separate automotive parts: the Hush Panel, Silencer, and JS Dash Close Out Panel. The pertinent contract documents are the “Purchase Order” and an “Amended Purchase Order” executed by Reis. For ease of reference, we refer to these documents collectively as “the Agreement.”

While Reis was in the process of manufacturing the Laser and fixtures pursuant to the Agreement, Concept informed Reis that Concept had terminated the Hush Panel fixtures program. Reis alleges that Concept informed Reis that the associated fixtures were no longer needed. The parties agreed to amend the price of the Agreement to reflect the cancellation of the Hush Panel fixtures by reducing the purchase price of the fixtures and providing payment for work performed. Following the cancellation of the Hush Panel fixtures, the amended purchase price of the Agreement was $911,000.

In July 2005, Reis presented and demonstrated the Laser to Concept. In August 2005, Concept informed Reis of changes to the JS Dash Silencer part. Concept’s changes to the JS Dash Silencer part required Reis to redesign the associated fixtures. Reis alleges that Concept directed Reis to make modifications under the Agreement, but Concept denies this allegation. Reis asserts that it was entitled to the original purchase price of the JS Dash Silencer fixtures and for work performed on their redesign and remanufacture.

In October 2005, Reis again presented and demonstrated the Laser to Concept. On October 11, 2005, Concept acknowledged receipt of the Laser at its Michigan facility by issuing an Acceptance Test Certificate.

In November 2005, Concept informed Reis that Concept had terminated the JS Dash Close Out Panel program and that the associated fixtures, which Reis was still working on, were no longer needed. Reis alleges that it was entitled to payment for work already performed on the JS Dash Close Out Panel fixtures prior to cancellation, a total of $6,900. Concept denies that Reis was entitled to payment of this amount.

The parties agree that Concept has paid’ Reis $588,600 to date. Reis asserts that Concept breached the Agreement by failing to pay a remaining balance of $264,300 plus interest. Concept denies that it owes Reis any additional money under the Agreement.

2. Concept’s Allegations

The following additional facts are gleaned from Concept’s “Answer, Affirmative Defense, and Counterclaim.” Concept alleges that prior to entering the Agreement, the parties engaged in extensive negotiations regarding the specifications of the Laser, particularly the Laser’s cutting speed, also called “cycle time,” meaning the time required to complete one part. During the negotiations, Reis, through its sales manager Dino Chece, allegedly made various written promises to Concept indicating that the Laser would trim the JS Dash Silencer fixtures with a cycle time of 60-70 seconds per part or faster. Relying on these promises by Reis, Concept entered into the Agreement.

The Agreement stated that the “Application” of the Laser was for the cutting of parts such as Hush Panel/Panels Close/Silencer.” The Agreement did not mention the 60-70 second cycle time, but did provide as follows:

Necessary cycle time per component is indicated from Concept Industries with 23.7 sec per part including loading/ unloading and inspection. During our test in Chicago we were able to cut the parts in 17-20 sec. The table rotating time is 3 sec. The loading/unloading as well as inspection is done during sic the robot is cutting the part, therefore this time does not need to be added to the overall cycle. Reis Robotics is NOT responsible for the Operator related cycle times.

The Agreement also contained an express warranty that the Laser would be free from defects in material and workmanship.

According to Concept, at a demonstration of the Laser conducted by Reis on May 26, 2005, Concept personnel questioned Mr. Chece and Dr. Wenzel, Reis's general manager, about the Laser's apparent slow cutting speed of JS Dash Silencer parts during the demonstration. In response to Concept's concerns, Mr. Chece and Dr. Wenzel responded that the Laser was not yet optimized and that Concept had "nothing to worry about." When Concept accepted possession of the Laser at its facility, the certificate of acceptance indicated that cycle times "cannot be checked without the production fixture." Following the installation of the Laser at Concept's facility, Concept repeatedly expressed to Reis concerns regarding the cutting speed of the Laser. Concept repeatedly requested assurances from Reis that the cycle time for the JS Dash Silencer would be 60-70 seconds per part, as promised earlier by Mr. Chece. After it became clear to Concept that the Laser would be unable to achieve the promised cycle time, on December 21, 2005, a representative of Concept sent Reis an email informing Reis that "Concept is pursuing the implementation of an alternate production process" and requesting that Reis "place all production fixtures design work that is currently in-process on the LHD and RHD JS Dash Silencers on hold."

On January 6, 2006, Reis informed Concept in writing that the Laser's cycle time for the JS Dash Silencer would be between 150-195 seconds per part, far longer than what was originally promised. According to Concept, to date the Laser has failed to come close to achieving the initially promised cycle time of 60-70 seconds per part, a defect that was. "fatal" to Concept's ability to manufacture parts in the volumes required by its customers.

As for the JS Dash Silencer fixtures, Concept alleges that it only authorized Reis to design the JS Dash Silencer fixtures and never authorized Reis to begin manufacturing the fixtures. According to Concept, between April and October 2005, the parties exchanged numerous communications through which both parties indicated that Reis would wait for Concept's final design approval prior to initiating any production of the JS Dash Silencer fixtures. Concept alleges that it never gave Reis final design approval and therefore is not responsible for any charges related to the production of the JS Dash Silencer fixtures.

Concept also raises counterclaims against Reis for: (1) fraudulent inducement; (2) misrepresentation; (3) unjust enrichment; (4) promissory estoppel; (5) breach of contract; (6) breach of express warranty; and (7) overpayment. All of the claims are premised on the Laser's inability to achieve the cycle time allegedly discussed by the parties.

MOTION TO STRIKE AND DISMISS AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSES

We turn first to Reis's motion to strike and dismiss various portions of Concept's affirmative defenses.

I. Legal Standard

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(f) permits the Court to strike “any insufficiently pled claim, defense, or other matter asserted in the pleading which is redundant, immaterial, impertinent or scandalous matter.” Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(f). Motions to strike are generally disfavored because of their potential to delay proceedings. Nonetheless, a motion to strike can be a useful means of removing “unnecessary clutter” from a case, which in effect expedite the proceedings.

Affirmative defenses are pleadings and, as such, are subject to all the same requirements applicable to complaints. Thus, affirmative defenses must set forth a plain statement of the basis for the defense. Fed. R.Civ.P. 8(a). Even under the liberal pleading standards of the Federal Rules, an affirmative defense must include either inferential allegations as to all elements of the defense asserted. “Bare bone allegations” are not sufficient.

This Court applies a three-part test for examining the sufficiency of an affirmative defense. First, we determine whether the matter is appropriately pled as an affirmative defense. Second, we determine whether the defense is adequately pled under Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 8 and 9. Id. Third, we evaluate the sufficiency of the defense pursuant to a standard identified by Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). Before granting a motion to strike an affirmative defense, the Court must be convinced that there are no unresolved questions of fact, that any questions of law are clear, and that under no set of circumstances could the defense succeed. In a case premised on diversity jurisdiction, “the legal and factual sufficiency of an affirmative defense is examined with reference to state law.” With these principles in mind, we turn to the specific arguments raised in the motion.

II. Analysis

For its first affirmative defense Concept asserts: “The complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.” Reis argues that this is not a proper affirmative defense. There is a long-standing debate in this District regarding whether “failure to state a claim” may be raised as an affirmative defense or instead must be raised by separate motion. Notably, as one court in this District has observed, although failure to state a claim, may not meet the technical definition of an affirmative defense, Form 20 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure’s Appendix contains “failure to state a claim” as a model defense. Rule 84 specifically authorizes the use of the defenses contained in the Forms. Fed.R.Civ.P. 84. In light of Rule 84 and Form 20, the Court finds that the Court has authority under the Federal Rules to permit an affirmative defense based on failure to state a claim.

Nonetheless, Concept has failed to adequately plead the defense in accordance with Rule 84. Concept’s first affirmative defense is nothing more than a recitation of the standard defense available to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). As alleged, the defense provides no explanation as to what portion of the complaint Reis has failed to state a claim. Although Concept’s defense contains detailed factual allegations, these allegations are not mentioned or incorporated into the defense.

reference in the affirmative defenses. Additionally, it is not clear what portion of the lengthy counterclaim allegations are intended to support Concept's failure to state a claim defense. The Court agrees that clarity is needed as to the basis of this defense, and accordingly, the first affirmative defense is stricken without prejudice.

As its second affirmative defense Concept states: "Reis breached the contract on which it purports to rely, and that contract may be void for fraud and/or failure of consideration." Breach of contract, fraud, and failure of consideration are all matters that may be pled as affirmative defenses. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(c). However, the Court agrees with Reis that Concept's defenses, as pled, do not satisfy the pleading requirements of Rule 8(a). The breach of contract defense fails to make reference to any of the elements of a breach of contract claim, and additionally, Concept fails to plead with heightened particularity the alleged circumstances constituting fraud as required by Rule 9(b). Again, although Concept has included detailed allegations in its counterclaim, it does not link these allegations in any way to the affirmative defenses, nor is it clear what particular paragraphs of the counterclaim allegations would apply to this affirmative defense. Accordingly, the Court strikes Concept's second affirmative defense without prejudice.

As its third affirmative defense, Concept alleges: "Reis's payment claims for the silencer fixture are barred because Concept never authorized Reis to begin manufacturing the fixture, as Reis itself has acknowledged." Reis argues that this affirmative defense is legally inadequate. The concept of an affirmative defense under Rule 8(c) "requires a responding party to admit a complaint's allegations but then permits the responding party to assert that for some legal reason it is nonetheless excused from liability (or perhaps from full liability)." Concept's third affirmative defense does not meet this criteria, but instead is merely a restatement of the denials contained in its answer. As such, the affirmative defense is not only unnecessary but also improper. However, to the extent Concept intended to raise some affirmative matter here, the Court will give Concept an opportunity to replead. Accordingly, the third affirmative defense is stricken without prejudice.

As its fourth affirmative defense, Concept alleges: "Reis's claims are subsumed by Concept's right of set-off and/or recoupment. Alternatively, the amount of Concept's claims against Reis exceeds the amount of Reis's claim against Concept." Reis argues that the affirmative defense is nothing more than a recapitulation of Concept's denial of the amount of damages claimed to be owed in the complaint. In its response brief, Concept fails to offer any analysis refuting Reis's argument. The Court agrees that this affirmative defense appears to be simply a restatement of the denials contained in Concept's answer, which is improper. However, to the extent Concept intended to raise some affirmative matter here, the Court will give Concept an opportunity to replead. The fourth affirmative defense is therefore stricken without prejudice.

Concept's fifth affirmative defense states: "Reis's claims are barred or limited by laches, waiver, estoppel, unclean hands, or similar legal or equitable doctrines." Laches, waiver, estoppel, and unclean hands are equitable defenses that must be pled with the specific elements required to establish the defense. Merely stringing together a long list of legal defenses is insufficient to satisfy Rule 8(a). "It is unacceptable for a party's attorney simply to mouth affirmative defenses in formula-like fashion ('laches,' 'estoppel,' 'statute of limitations' or what have you), for that does not do the job of apprising opposing counsel and this Court of the predicate for the claimed defense — which after all is the goal of notice pleading.” This is precisely what done here. Indeed, in asserting “similar legal or equitable doctrines,” Concept fails on notice as to even the legal bases for its defenses. Thus, the Court strikes Concept’s affirmative defense without prejudice.

Concept’s sixth affirmative defense states: “Concept reserves the right to add affirmative defenses as they become known through discovery.” This is not a proper defense. If at some later point in the litigation Concept believes that the additional affirmative defense is warranted, it may seek leave to amend its pleadings pursuant to Rule 12(b) and (h). Accordingly, Concept’s sixth affirmative defense is stricken with prejudice.

MOTION TO STRIKE PORTIONS OF DEFENDANT’S ANSWER

Reis next moves to strike various portions of Concept’s answer for failing to comply with Rule 8 provides in relevant part:

A party shall state in short and plain terms the party’s defenses to each claim asserted. A party may admit or deny the averments upon which the adverse party relies. If a party is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of an averment, the party shall so state and has the effect of a denial. Denials shall fairly meet the substance of the averments denied. A party pleader intends in good faith to deny only a part or a qualification of an averment, the party shall specify so much of it as is true and material and shall deny only the remainder.

Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(b). Reis argues that Concept has violated Rule 8 by including improper language in Paragraphs 5, 6, and 7. Specifically, Reis objects to the following language contained in each of the aforementioned Paragraphs: “To the extent the alleged ‘commercial purchase order’ was issued by [Concept] by issuance of this purchase order failed to warrant the trim speed and cycle time required, it was procured by fraud and was of no validity; accordingly, the remaining averments in this paragraph are denied as true.” Upon review, the Court concludes that the above language does not constitute an admission or denial of Reis’s allegations as required by Rule 8. The language is equivocal and serves to confuse the issues that are in dispute.

Similarly, Reis argues that Paragraphs 15, 16, 20 each contain language that does not comply with Rule 8. Upon review, the Court finds that the last sentence of Paragraph 15, the first two sentences of Paragraph 16, and in Paragraph 20, all of the language following the statement “Concept denies these allegations as untrue,” renders the answers equivocal and impossible to interpret under Rule 8. Accordingly, Paragraphs 5, 6, 7, 15, 16, and 20 are stricken with leave to replead. Concept shall follow Rule 8(b)’s directive that it admit, deny, or state that it has sufficient knowledge to admit or deny. To the extent Concept must give a qualified denial, Concept must “specify so much of it as is true and material and shall deny only the remainder.” See Fed. R.Civ.P. 8(b).

Reis also seeks to strike Concept's prayer for attorneys fees and costs. As a general matter, Illinois follows the "American rule," such that attorneys fees and costs are ordinarily not awarded to the prevailing party unless authorized by statute or provided for by contract. Concept responds that it is merely attempting to preserve its ability to obtain fees should it later be determined that it is entitled to do so. At this early stage of the litigation, the Court cannot determine as a definitive matter that fees and costs are wholly unavailable to Concept. Thus, the Court declines to strike the request for attorneys fees and costs.

4. Amendments

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 15

(a) Amendments Before Trial.

(1) Amending as a Matter of Course. A party may amend its pleading once as a matter of course within:

- (A) 21 days after serving it, or
- (B) if the pleading is one to which a responsive pleading is required, 21 days after service of a responsive pleading or 21 days after service of a motion under Rule 12(b), (e), or (f), whichever is earlier.

(2) Other Amendments. In all other cases, a party may amend its pleading only with the opposing party's written consent or the court's leave. The court should freely give leave when justice so requires.

(3) Time to Respond. Unless the court orders otherwise, any required response to an amended pleading must be made within the time remaining to respond to the original pleading or within 14 days after service of the amended pleading, whichever is later.

(b) Amendments During and After Trial.

(1) Based on an Objection at Trial. If, at trial, a party objects that evidence is not within the issues raised in the pleadings, the court may permit the pleadings to be amended. The court should freely permit an amendment when doing so will aid in presenting the merits and the objecting party fails to satisfy the court that the evidence would prejudice that party's action or defense on the merits. The court may grant a continuance to enable the objecting party to meet the evidence.

(2) For Issues Tried by Consent. When an issue not raised by the pleadings is parties' express or implied consent, it must be treated in all respects as if pleadings. A party may move—at any time, even after judgment—to amend to conform them to the evidence and to raise an unpleaded issue. But failure does not affect the result of the trial of that issue.

(c) Relation Back of Amendments.

(1) When an Amendment Relates Back. An amendment to a pleading relates back to the original pleading when:

(A) the law that provides the applicable statute of limitations allows relation

(B) the amendment asserts a claim or defense that arose out of the conduct or occurrence set out—or attempted to be set out—in the original pleading; or

(C) the amendment changes the party or the naming of the party against whom asserted, if Rule 15(c)(1)(B) is satisfied and if, within the period provided by serving the summons and complaint, the party to be brought in by amendment

(i) received such notice of the action that it will not be prejudiced in defending its merits; and

(ii) knew or should have known that the action would have been brought for a mistake concerning the proper party's identity.

4.1 When Amendments are Allowed

Shiflet v. Allstate Ins. Co., 233 F.R.D. 465 (D.S.C.

DUFFY, District Judge.

This matter is before the court on Defendant Allstate Insurance Company's Motion for Summary Judgment. Plaintiff Kathryn Shiflet opposes this motion. For the reasons set forth above, Plaintiff's Motion for Summary Judgment is denied and Defendant's motion is granted.

BACKGROUND

On January 4, 2004, Plaintiff Kathryn Shiflet's mobile home and personal belongings were destroyed by fire. At the time of the fire, Plaintiff's mobile home was covered under a policy provided by Allstate Insurance. On November 3, 2004, Plaintiff initiated this action against Defendant Allstate Insurance for breach of contract, bad faith, and violation of the insurance claims practices statute, after Allstate allegedly wrongfully denied Plaintiff's Defendant Allstate originally filed its answer to the original complaint on December 6, 2004. Then, on May 31, 2005, Plaintiff amended the original complaint with the leave of the court. On June 3, 2005, Defendant filed its answer to the Amended Complaint, including a motion to join Mr. Shiflet as a necessary party or, if that is not feasible, that the action be dismissed.¹(#co_footnote_B00112008358850_1) On November 10, 2005, Defendant filed a motion to amend its answer to the Amended Complaint so as to include the defense of arson. Five days after Defendant filed this motion to amend, the court adopted, with the consent of both parties, a Second Amended Scheduling Order. This Order specified that any amended pleadings would be due by December 15, 2005 and that discovery was to be completed by March 1, 2006.

On January 13, 2006, Plaintiff filed her response in opposition to Defendant's motion to amend its answer. Plaintiff argues that the proposed amendment should be denied because it is prejudicial to Plaintiff, in bad faith, and would be futile.

DISCUSSION

Rule 15(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides that "a party may amend the party's pleading only by leave of court or by written consent of the adverse party; and leave shall be freely given when justice so requires." While the decision to grant a party leave to amend a pleading is within the sound discretion of the trial court, that discretion is limited by the general policy favoring the resolution of cases on the merits.

In exercising its discretion to amend, a court should focus on factors like "undue delay, bad faith, or dilatory motive on the part of the movant, repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed, futility of amendment, etc." Mere delay unaccompanied by prejudice, bad faith, or futility in moving to amend is not a sufficient reason to deny leave to amend. The Fourth Circuit has held that "if the underlying facts or circumstances relied upon by a plaintiff may be a proper subject of relief, he ought to be afforded an opportunity to test his claim on the merits." Moreover, the Supreme Court has declared that leave to amend "shall be freely given when justice so requires."

Here, the court believes that Defendant's motion for leave to amend its answer should be granted. First, Defendant filed the motion to amend its answer within the time as provided by the scheduling order and when over three months remained before discovery was due. Accordingly, Defendant timely amended and Plaintiff is not prejudiced by undue delay. Additionally, Defendant alleges that it has uncovered "new additional information" through discovery that was not available when Defendant filed its amended answer. As such, Defendant is not acting in bad faith in moving to amend, but rather, is preserving a defense that may well be available to it.

Further, because the proposed additional defense of arson is a complete defense to Plaintiff's claims, the court believes that allowing amendment will aid in resolving the case on the merits. Despite Plaintiff's arguments to the contrary, the court does not believe that Defendant's amendment is futile, as Defendant seeks to raise a potentially viable complete defense. In short, the court finds that Defendant's proposed amendment is not prejudicial to Plaintiff, not in bad faith, and not obviously futile. Accordingly, the court grants Defendant's motion, and directs Plaintiff to file appropriate responsive pleadings to the First Amended Answer.

CONCLUSION

It is therefore ORDERED, for the foregoing reasons, that Defendant's Motion to Amend is GRANTED.

Dolphin Kickboxing Co. v. Franchoice, Inc., No. 19-cv-1477 (D. Minn. May 6, 2020)

ELIZABETH COWAN WRIGHT, Magistrate Judge.

This matter is before the Court on Plaintiffs' Motion to Amend Complaint. For the reasons below, the Motion is granted in part and denied in part.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

The "Facts" section of the proposed amended complaint is exactly the same as the original Complaint. For the sake of brevity, the Court incorporates the "Facts" section of the Report and Recommendation into this Order. The proposed amended complaint also contains the same claim for fraud as found in the original Complaint. Defendants did not move to dismiss this claim. Defendants did move to dismiss the common law fraud claim as part of their Motion to Dismiss. The claim asserted by Plaintiff is that Defendants committed fraud by knowingly making false representations to Plaintiffs with the purpose of inducing them to purchase an ILKB franchise. In addition, the fraud claim asserted by Plaintiff is that Defendants knew or should have known that these representations proved to be untrue; Plaintiffs reasonably relied on this information in deciding to purchase an ILKB franchise, and as a result Plaintiffs have suffered damages in excess of $500,000.

The only substantive addition to the proposed amended complaint is Count V seeking damages. This proposed count incorporates the allegations in the preceding paragraph and then alleges as follows:

Defendants deliberately and intentionally disregarded the rights of Plaintiffs and disregarded the substantial likelihood of serious injury and damages to Plaintiffs by representing that they would match Plaintiffs only with franchises that Defendants had investigated and vetted. Defendants knew that the franchises were of high quality; and that Defendants would provide Plaintiffs with all the information necessary to make an informed decision. Defendants knew that Michael Parrella, the owner of ILKB, Michael Parrella, had filed for bankruptcy in 2003 and that his discharge had been revoked in 2008; and knew or should have known, in the exercise of reasonable inquiry or investigation, that Parrella's discharge was revoked for failure to pay federal taxes and that there were two adversary proceedings in bankruptcy accusing Parrella of fraud and fraudulent transfers. Defendants failed to conduct any serious, systematic or professional due diligence upon ILKB; instead all they did was to consider buying a few existing franchisees, many of whom did not own the type of ILKB franchise that Plaintiffs were considering buying, and Defendants prepared no report, summary or investigation of ILKB. Defendants simply took representations of ILKB about the nature of the franchise, including representations that it was suitable for absentee ownership; that no units had closed; that the ILKB franchisees made revenues and profits at a certain level; and that ILKB did all of the things that Defendants represented.

for franchisees, and passed them on to Plaintiffs without checking on them. > > - Defendants knew that ILKB engaged in blatantly illegal marketing techniques as early as March 2015 and never questioned whether such techniques had ceased, thus exposing Plaintiffs to the high likelihood, if not certainty, that Plaintiffs would be the victims of fraud. > > - Defendants disregarded complaints and warning signs from ILKB franchisees as the whining of "stupid, selfish and ungrateful franchisees" instead of investigating such complaints and determining whether they were true. > > - Defendants made specific representations as set forth in the proposed amended complaint about ILKB without investigating or verifying them, when such representations were false and were known or should have been known to Defendants as false.

According to the proposed amended complaint, as a result of Defendants' deliberate disregard of Plaintiffs' rights, Plaintiffs are entitled to punitive damages.

II. LEGAL STANDARD

Rule 15(a) sets the general standard for amending pleadings in Federal court. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15. Rule 15(a) provides that leave to amend "shall be freely given when justice so requires." The determination as to whether to grant leave to amend is entrusted to the sound discretion of the trial court. The Eighth Circuit has held that although amendment of a pleading "should be allowed liberally to ensure that a case is decided on its merits there is no absolute right to amend."

Denial of leave to amend may be justified by "undue delay, bad faith on the part of the moving party, futility of the amendment or unfair prejudice to the opposing party." "Denial of a motion for leave to amend on the basis of futility means the district court has reached the legal conclusion that the amended complaint could not withstand a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Accordingly, in reviewing a denial of leave to amend we ask whether the proposed amended complaint states a cause of action under the Twombly pleading standard."

The relevant legal basis for punitive damages under Minnesota law provides:

Punitive damages shall be allowed in civil actions only upon clear and convincing evidence that the acts of the defendant show deliberate disregard for the rights or safety of others.

- b. A defendant has acted with deliberate disregard for the rights or safety of others if the defendant has knowledge of facts or intentionally disregards facts that create a high probability of injury to the rights or safety of others and:
 - i. deliberately proceeds to act in conscious or intentional disregard of the high degree of probability of injury to the rights or safety of others; or
 - ii. deliberately proceeds to act with indifference to the high probability of injury to the rights or safety of others.

III. ANALYSIS

With respect to Rule 15, Defendants argue that the Motion should be denied because Plaintiffs' amendment is not futile if the proposed amended complaint contains factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face'. The question is whether the proposed amended complaint plausibly alleges facts showing that the acts of Defendants show deliberate disregard for the rights or safety of others whenever they act.

A defendant has acted with deliberate disregard for the rights or safety of others if the defendant has knowledge of facts or intentionally disregards facts that create a high probability of injury to the rights or safety of others and:

1. deliberately proceeds to act in conscious or intentional disregard of the high degree of probability of injury to the rights or safety of others; or
2. deliberately proceeds to act with indifference to the high probability of injury to the rights or safety of others.

Under these criteria, "a defendant operates with 'deliberate disregard' by acting with indifference to threaten the rights or safety of others." As such, "the mere existence of gross negligence does not rise to the level required so as to warrant a claim for damages." Moreover, Plaintiffs must allege that Defendants were aware of a high probability that their conduct would cause injury to Plaintiffs. Put another way, the Court looks to see if Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that Defendants knew of facts, or intentionally disregarded facts, that created a high probability that Defendants' actions would harm the rights or safety of Plaintiffs.

Defendants argue that the proposed amended complaint lacks allegations of "knowledge of facts" that create a high probability of injury to the rights or safety of others. Defendants point to the fact that one of the allegations in the proposed amended complaint that: "Defendants knew ILKB owner Michael Parrella, had filed for bankruptcy in 2003; that his discharge from bankruptcy was vacated in 2008 for failure to pay federal taxes; and that adversary proceedings in the bankruptcy court accused Parrella of fraud and fraudulent transfers." According to Defendants, no allegation in the proposed amended complaint plausibly suggests that withholding this information from Plaintiffs creates a high probability that Plaintiffs' rights would be harmed as it relates to purchasing an ILKB franchise. This Court agrees. It is hard to understand how an omission of a bankruptcy filing, a failure to pay taxes discovered in 2008, and accusation of an unexplained fraud (without any indication as to the outcome), necessarily created a high probability of injury to the rights and safety of Plaintiffs in relation to purchasing an ILKB franchise almost 10 years later. In other words, even assuming that Defendants knowingly omitted these facts from Plaintiffs' complaint, the Court finds that these allegations do not plausibly allege that Defendants were aware, based on these facts, that there was the high probability that purchasing an ILKB franchise would harm the rights and safety of Plaintiffs.

The Court also agrees with Defendants that allegations in the proposed amended complaint regarding representations made by Defendants to Plaintiffs offering to match the representations of franchises that Defendants had investigated" and then not conducting "any serious or professional due diligence upon ILKB" or taking ILKB's representations at face value amounts to gross negligence on the part of Defendants as to their duty to Plaintiffs.

mere showing of negligence, even gross negligence, is not sufficient to sustain a claim of punitive damages. Moreover, there are no allegations, save for the alleged illegal marketing (addressed below), that would have given Defendants reason not to believe ILKB's representations so as to create a high probability of harm to Plaintiffs.

The Court acknowledges that Plaintiffs allege Defendants knew that ILKB engaged in blatantly illegal marketing techniques as early as March 2015 and never questioned whether such techniques had ceased, thus exposing Plaintiffs to the high likelihood, if not certainty, that Plaintiffs would be the victims of fraud. To comply with Rule 8, a claimant "must 'give the defendant fair notice of what the plaintiff's claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'" As pointed out by Defendants, the allegations regarding illegal marketing are conclusory, as Plaintiffs do not identify in the proposed amended complaint the marketing techniques communicated to or used by Plaintiffs. These conclusory allegations do not give Defendants adequate notice of the claim for the purposes of Rule 8 and therefore, it is futile with respect to those allegations for the purposes of the punitive damages claim. Similarly, the proposed amended complaint alleges that Defendants disregarded complaints and warning signs from ILKB franchisees as the whining of "stupid, selfish and ungrateful franchisees" instead of investigating such complaints and determining whether they were true. These allegations do not provide adequate notice of a claim for punitive damages because they do not set forth what those complaints entailed and how they bore on the Defendants' alleged misconduct with respect to Plaintiffs so as to find that Defendants' disregard created a high probability of harm to Plaintiffs.

However, Plaintiffs do allege that Defendants made specific representations about ILKB without investigating or verifying them, when such representations were false and were known or should have been known to Defendants as false. The specific representations Plaintiffs appear to be referencing pertain to Defendants' representations to Plaintiffs, including that: ILKB owners were making over $200,000 per year in profits, and this level of profitability for them was normal; if Gould bought three franchises, he could increase his profits; an ILKB franchise was suitable for semi-absentee ownership; and that no ILKB franchises had ever closed. These alleged misrepresentations were made to induce Plaintiffs into purchasing an ILKB franchise. As a starting point, the Court rejects any argument by Defendants that these allegations fail to state a claim for punitive damages merely because Plaintiffs allege in part that Defendants should have known that their representations regarding ILKB were false. Defendants contend that such allegations, if proven true, at most demonstrate negligence, as opposed to willful or willfully indifferent conduct, which is required for punitive damages. However, this argument ignores the alternative allegation that Defendants "knew" the representations were false. Rule 8 expressly authorizes pleading in the alternative.

Defendants do not argue that punitive damages are not available in cases involving fraud. Indeed, courts have concluded that such damages are appropriate in the context of fraud. In this case, allegations regarding representations by Defendants that ILKB franchises were making over $200,000 per year in profits, and this level of profitability for them was normal; if Gould bought three franchises, he could increase his profits; an ILKB franchise was suitable for semi-absentee ownership; and that no ILKB franchises had ever closed, all go to the financial viability of an ILKB franchise. Assuming as true the allegations that Defendants made these representations to Plaintiffs, and the allegations that Defendants knew these representations were false when they made them to Plaintiffs, when construed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, these allegations set forth a plausible claim that Defendants conscious indifference provided Plaintiffs with inaccurate information about ILKB in order to encourage Plaintiffs into investing in an ILKB franchise thereby creating a high probability that Defendants would harm Plaintiffs' rights with respect to their franchise purchase.

In sum, Plaintiffs' Motion is granted only to the extent that it seeks to add a claim for punitive damages in relation to the specifically alleged fraudulent representations made by Defendants to Plaintiffs that: (1) ILKB franchises were making over $200,000 per year in profits, which level of profitability for them was normal; (2) if Gould bought three franchises, he could double his profits; (3) an ILKB franchise was suitable for semi-absentee ownership; and (4) no ILKB franchises had ever closed. The Motion is otherwise denied. The Court reminds Plaintiffs that this analysis was conducted under the liberal pleading standard of Rule 15, and that the Court granting them leave to amend does not imply that they are likely to succeed on their claim for punitive damages.

4.2 Relation Back of Amendments

Moore v. Baker, 989 F.2d 1129 (11th Cir. 1993)

MORGAN, Senior Circuit Judge:

Appellant contends that her doctor violated Georgia's informed consent law by failing to inform her that ethylene diamine tetra acetic acid chelation (EDTA) therapy was an alternative to surgery. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the appellees on the ground that EDTA therapy is not a "generally recognized or accepted" treatment for coronary surgery. We AFFIRM.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Appellant, Judith Moore, was suffering from a partial blockage of her left common carotid artery which impeded the flow of oxygen to her brain and caused her to feel dizzy and to have a headache. In April of 1989, she consulted with appellee Dr. Roy Baker, an employee of the Neurology Institute of Savannah, P.C. (NIS), about her symptoms. Dr. Baker diagnosed a blockage of her left carotid artery due to arteriosclerotic plaque and recommended that she undergo a non-invasive surgical procedure known as a carotid endarterectomy to correct her medical problem.

Dr. Baker discussed the proposed procedure with Moore and advised her of the risks involved in undergoing the surgery. He did not advise her, however, of an alternative treatment, namely EDTA therapy. Moore signed a written consent allowing Dr. Baker to perform a carotid endarterectomy on April 7, 1989. Following surgery, she appeared to recover well, but experienced hospital staff discovered that Moore was weak on one side. Dr. Baker reopened the operative wound and removed a blood clot that had formed in the artery. Although the clot was removed and the area repaired, Moore suffered permanent brain damage. As a result, Moore is permanently and severely disabled.

On April 8, 1991, the last day permitted by the statute of limitations, Moore filed a complaint alleging that Dr. Baker committed medical malpractice by failing to inform her of the availability of EDTA therapy as an alternative to surgery in violation of Georgia's informed consent law. According to Moore's complaint, EDTA therapy is as effective as carotid endarterectomy in treating coronary blockages, but it does not entail those risks that accompany invasive surgery.

On August 6, 1991 Dr. Baker filed a motion for summary judgment on the issue of informed consent. On August 26, 1991, Moore moved to amend her complaint to assert allegations of negligence by Dr. Baker in the performance of the surgery and in his post-operative care of Moore. Originally, on September 3, 1991, the district court granted Moore's motion to amend her complaint. Shortly thereafter, the district court granted Dr. Baker's motion for summary judgment on the informed consent issue, finding that EDTA therapy is not a "generally recognized or accepted" alternative treatment for coronary surgery. One month later, the district court vacated its September 3rd order and denied Moore's motion to amend her complaint, thus terminating all of Moore's outstanding claims. Moore now appeals the denial of her motion to amend her complaint as well as the grant of summary judgment in favor of Dr. Baker and NIS.

I.

Moore claims that the district court abused its discretion by vacating its earlier order and denying Moore's motion to amend her complaint. Leave to amend a complaint "shall be freely given when justice so requires." Fed.R.Civ.P. 15(a). While a decision whether to grant leave to amend is clearly within the discretion of the district court, a justifying reason must be apparent for denial of a motion to amend. In the instant case, the lower court denied leave to amend on the ground that the newly-asserted claim was barred by the applicable statute of limitations and that allowing the amendment would, therefore, be futile. If correct, the district court's rationale would be sufficient to support a denial of leave to amend the complaint.

Moore filed her original complaint on the last day permitted by Georgia's statute of limitations. Accordingly, the statute of limitations bars the claim asserted in Moore's proposed amended complaint unless the amended complaint relates back to the date of the original complaint. An amendment relates back to the original filing "whenever the claim or defense asserted in the amended pleading arose out of the conduct, transaction, or occurrence set forth or attempted to be set forth in the original pleading." Fed.R.Civ.P. 15(c). The critical issue in Rule 15(c) determinations is whether the original complaint gave notice to the defendant of the claim now being asserted. "When new or distinct conduct, transactions, or occurrences are alleged as grounds for recovery, there is no relation back, and recovery under the amended complaint is barred by limitations if it was untimely filed."

Moore relies heavily on Azarbal v. Medical Center of Delaware, Inc. which addressed the issue of relation back in the context of a medical malpractice case. In Azarbal, the original complaint asserted claims of negligence in the performance of an amniocentesis on the plaintiff, resulting in injury to the fetus. After the statute of limitations had expired, the plaintiff sought to amend the complaint to add a claim that the doctor failed to obtain her informed consent before performing a sterilization procedure on her because the doctor did not tell her that she had probably been injured by the amniocentesis. The district court found that the amended complaint provided adequate notice of any claims Ms. Azarbal would have arising from the amniocentesis, including a claim that Dr. Palacio should have revealed that the procedure caused fetal injury.^[18]

The instant case is clearly distinguishable from Azarbal. Unlike the complaint in Azarbal, the allegations asserted in Moore's original complaint contain nothing to put Dr. Baker on notice that the new claims of negligence might be asserted. Even when given a liberal construction of the original complaint, there is nothing in Moore's original complaint which makes reference to any acts of negligence by Dr. Baker either during or after surgery.^[18] The original complaint only alleged that Dr. Baker's actions before Moore decided to undergo surgery, but the amended complaint asserted claims of negligence against Dr. Baker's actions during and after the surgery. The alleged acts of negligence occurred at different times and involved separate and distinct conduct. In order to recover on the new claims contained in her amended complaint, Moore would have to prove completely different facts than those proved in the original complaint, which would otherwise have been required to recover on the informed consent claim in the original complaint.

We must conclude that Moore's new claim does not arise out of the same conduct, transaction, or occurrence as the claims in the original complaint. Therefore, the amended complaint does not relate back to the original complaint, and the proposed new claims are barred by the statute of limitations. Since the amended complaint could not withstand a motion to dismiss, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying Moore's motion to amend the complaint.

4.3 Change of Party or Naming of Party

Palacio v. City of Springfield, 25 F.Supp.3d 163 (Mass 2014)

NEIMAN, United States Magistrate Judge

^{18.} (n.1 in opinion) Moore's original complaint is very specific and focuses solely on Dr. Baker's failure to inform Moore of EDTA therapy as an alternative to surgery. Although the complaint recounts the details of the operation and subsequent recovery, it does not hint that Dr. Baker's actions were negligent. In fact, the only references in the original complaint relating to the surgery or post-operative care suggest that Dr. Baker acted with reasonable care. The complaint states that "the nurses noticed a sudden onset of right sided weakness of which they immediately informed Defendant Baker." "Upon being informed of this rightsidedweakness, Defendant Baker immediately caused Plaintiff to be returned to the operation suite. Although the clot was promptly removed by Defendant Baker."

Carlos A. Palacio, Sidney G. Gaviria Orrego and Carlos D. Palacio (“Plaintiffs”) seek to amend their complaint to substitute the names of five police officers—Greg Bigda, Clayton Roberson, Steven Kent, Sean Arpin, and Barry Delameter—for the four “John Does” originally named as defendants with the City of Springfield and William Fitchet, Springfield’s Police Commissioner. The City and Fitchet oppose the motion not only as untimely but as failing the “relation-back” provision set forth in Fed.R.Civ.P. 15(c)(1)(C). For the reasons which follow, the court will allow the motion, as Plaintiffs seek, pursuant to another subdivision of Rule 15, namely, (c)(1)(A).

I. Background

Plaintiffs filed their complaint in the Hampden County Superior Court on July 31, 2013, against the City, Fitchet and certain “John Does” who were employed by the City as police officers. Plaintiffs’ complaint asserted claims against all these defendants under 42 U.S.C. §§ 1983 and 1985, Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 12, §§ 11H and 11I (Massachusetts Civil Rights Act), and Chapter 214, § 1B (Massachusetts Right to Privacy Act), arising out of what Plaintiffs claim was an unjustified, unconstitutional, warrantless breaking and entering into and search of their home starting in the evening of August 4 through to the early morning of August 5, 2010. On August 14, 2013, the City and Fitchet filed their Notice of Removal of the action to this federal forum. The court thereafter entered a scheduling order on November 25, 2013, establishing February 25, 2014, as the deadline for filing motions to amend pleadings or join additional parties. This latter deadline was subsequently extended to April 15, 2014. Plaintiffs filed their instant motion for leave to amend on April 14, 2014.

II. Discussion

As the parties are well aware, leave to amend a complaint under Rule 15(a) is to be “freely given when justice so requires” absent an adequate basis to deny the amendment, such as futility, bad faith, undue delay or dilatory motive. In this vein, as Plaintiffs assert, the addition of new defendants or the assertion of new claims closely related to the original claims are the types of amendments that are generally permissible under the rule. Without more, therefore, the substitution of the true names of the John Doe defendants in the case at bar would be relatively commonplace. The amendment would be timely, i.e., not long after suit was filed and within the deadline set by the court, and none of the recently-identified John Does would appear to suffer undue prejudice were the amendment allowed; discovery is not scheduled to close until August 25, 2014, and, apparently, no depositions have yet been taken. The fact that Plaintiffs wish to substitute five named individuals for four John Does is immaterial.

As Plaintiffs acknowledge, however, their motion to amend comes more than three years after the precipitating incident in August of 2010, i.e., beyond the three year statute of limitations which the parties agree applies. That is easily remedied, Plaintiffs argue, because the proposed amendment would “relate back” to July 31, 2013, the date they filed the original complaint. In so arguing, Plaintiffs rely on Rule 15(c), which provides two different ways in which an amended complaint can relate back to the original. First, Rule 15(c)(1)(A) allows for relation back “when the law that provides the applicable statute of limitations,” in this case, Massachusetts law, “allows relation back.” Second, Rule 15(c)(1)(C) allows for relation back when the following requirements are met: (1) the claim “arose out of the same conduct, transaction or occurrence set out—or attempted to be set out—in the original pleading”; (2) the new party “received such notice within the time period of Rule 4(m), 120 days; and (3) the party “knew or should have known [within the Rule 4(m) time period] that the action would be brought against it, but for a mistake concerning the proper party’s identity.” See Krebs v. Crociere S.p.A., 560 U.S. 538, 547 (2010).

In response to Plaintiffs’ motion, the City and Fitchet ignore Plaintiffs’ argument without subsection (c)(1)(A) of Rule 15 and ground their entire opposition on subsection (c)(1)(C). There is a fair amount of support for their argument that John Doe substitutions back to the original complaint under Rule 15(c)(1)(C) when the sought-after substitution after the applicable statute of limitations has run on the underlying claim. Although the Third Circuit has not specifically addressed the issue, other circuits have concluded rather that a “plaintiff’s lack of knowledge of the intended defendant’s identity is not a ‘mistake’ concerning the identity of the proper party within the meaning of Rule 15(c)(1)(C).” These circuit courts have determined that section (c)(1)(C) simply does not cover this situation. In this District, Magistrate Judge David Hennessy recently came to this conclusion, although he determined in the particular matter before him that the plaintiff’s ability to amend his complaint was preserved by the doctrine of equitable tolling.

This approach is not without its critics, most particularly the Third Circuit in Pennsylvania Dep’t of Corrections. To be sure, the Third Circuit acknowledged that authority from other Courts of Appeals takes the position that the amendment of an original complaint—i.e., the substituting of real names for ‘John Does’ or ‘Unknown Persons’ in a complaint—does not meet the ‘but for a mistake’ requirement in 15(c)(1)(C). Not knowing the identity of a defendant is not a mistake concerning the defendant. Nonetheless, the Third Circuit opined, this was only a “plausible theory” subject to terms of both epistemology and semantics.” Indeed, the Third Circuit continued, this taken by the other circuits was “highly problematic.” The Third Circuit explained:

It is certainly not uncommon for victims of civil rights violations (e.g., an assault by police officers or prison guards) to be unaware of the identity of the person or persons who violated them. This information is in the possession of the defendants, and many plaintiffs cannot obtain this information until they have had a chance to undergo extensive discovery following institution of a civil action. If such plaintiffs are not allowed to relate back their amended “John Doe” complaint, then the statute of limitations period for these plaintiffs is effectively substantially shortened. It is for other plaintiffs who know the names of their assailants; the former group of plaintiffs would have to bring their lawsuits well before the end of the limitations period, immediately after discovery, and hope that they can determine the assailants’ names before the statute of limitations expires. There seems to be no good reason to disadvantage plaintiffs in this way simply because, for example, they were not able to see the name tag of the offending state actor.

That said, the Third Circuit appeared to be comfortably bound by its previous ruling in Varlack v. SWC Caribbean, Inc., which held that the amendment of a “John Doe” complaint could meet all the conditions of Rule 15(c)(1)(C) relation-back, including the “but for a mistake” requirement. Nonetheless, in the case before it, the Third Circuit affirmed the lower court’s denial of the plaintiff’s motion to amend, since the party who was proposed as a substitute, a psychologist who worked at the corrections institution, could not fairly be said to fall within the “Unknown Corrections Officers” named in the original complaint.

Here, the court need not resolve the instant motion by siding with one side or the other in the circuit split as it concerns Rule 15(c)(1)(C), interesting as that issue is. Instead, the court has determined that Rule 15(c)(1)(A) provides more than sufficient grounds to relate-back Plaintiffs’ amendment to the date of their original complaint. As Plaintiffs posit, Rule 15(c) was specifically amended in this regard in 1991 “to clarify that relation back may be permitted even if it does not meet the standard of the federal rule if it would be permitted under the applicable limitations law.” As the First Circuit explained in Morel v. DaimlerChrysler AG, Rule 15(c)(1)(A) “cements in place a one-way ratchet; less restrictive state relation-back rules will displace federal relation-back rules, but more restrictive state relation-back rules will not.” Accordingly, as Plaintiffs argue, the two parts of Rule 15(c)(1), subparagraphs (A) and (C), in essence enable a party to invoke the more permissive relation back rule. Thus, even were a court to conclude that subparagraph (c)(1)(C) does not apply, subparagraph (c)(1)(A) does provide the relief Plaintiffs seek in amending their complaint.

One further note in this regard. While this is not a diversity case—the more common route to applying Rule 15(c)(1)(A)—relation back is nonetheless available in the context of a section 1983 claim such as this so long as the borrowed limitation period, under state law, is subject to relation back. “Rule 15(c)(1)(A) instructs courts, then, to look to the entire body of limitations law that provides the applicable statute of limitations.” Since section 1983 derives its statute of limitations from state law, “under Rule 15(c)(1)(A), [the court] must determine if state law provides a ‘more forgiving principle of relations back’ in the John Doe context, compared to the federal relation back doctrine under Rule 15(c)(1)(C).”

Where federal law establishes a cause of action but does not specify a applicable limitations period for asserting claims, courts “borrow” the statute of limitations for analogous claims under state law. See Owens v. Okure, 488 U.S. 235, 240 (1989) (state statute of limitations for personal injury claims applies to federal civil rights claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983).

Although, as noted, the City and Fitchet do not address subparagraph (c)(1)(A) at all, they do acknowledge that a federal court which is called upon to adjudicate a section 1983 claim ordinarily must borrow the forum state’s limitation period governing personal injury causes of action. In this regard, the parties agree that Massachusetts prescribes a three year statute of limitations for personal injury actions, and that the First Circuit has adopted this prescriptive period for section 1983 cases arising in Massachusetts.^[19]

Given these agreements, the City and Fitchet must per force acknowledge that the law of the Commonwealth further provides that “any amendment allowed pursuant to [Mass. Gen. Laws c. 231, § 51] or pursuant to the Massachusetts Rules of Civil Procedure shall relate to the original pleading.” Thus, Massachusetts employs a liberal relation back rule that permits new parties to be added to an ongoing case even after the expiration of the limitations period. In short, Massachusetts law is more liberal than federal law with respect to the relation back principle and is, therefore, controlling.

19. (n.l in opinion) In turn, the statute of limitations for Plaintiffs’ state law claims are, respectively, three years for the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act, and three years for Mass. Laws claim.

That is not to say, of course, that plaintiffs can will-nilly amend their complaints or add defendants. As the Supreme Judicial Court explained with respect to Mass. ch. 231, § 51, various factors inform a decision to permit an amendment to a pleading. These factors include (1) whether an honest mistake had been made in selecting the defendants; (2) whether joinder of the real party in interest had been requested within a reasonable time after the mistake was discovered; (3) whether joinder is necessary to avoid an injustice; and (4) whether joinder would prejudice the nonmoving party.”

These factors are not unlike those applied by the courts to Fed.R.Civ.P. 15(a), namely, undue delay, bad faith, dilatory motive and undue prejudice. Indeed, in many ways, subsection (a) and (c) of Rule 15 act in tandem. Under subsection (a), the court must first determine whether an amendment to a complaint may be had before trial, whereupon the court will determine, if need be, whether the amendment relates back to the date of the original complaint. These two questions are generally addressed simultaneously. Still, depending on the circumstances, it would not necessarily be “procedurally fatal” for a court to allow a complaint to be amended so as to join a defendant and, much later, ruling against the defendant on relation back and limitations grounds.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a) sets forth the conditions under which a party may amend its complaint without mentioning whether an amendment relates back. Rule 15(c) then provides the limited conditions under which an amended complaint will relate back. (It is undisputed that the relevant conditions were met here.) Thus, unlike in Massachusetts, the mere allowance of an amendment does not resolve the relation back issue favorably to the amending party.

Here, the City and Fitchet acknowledge that, at the time the complaint was filed, Plaintiffs had no knowledge of the John Doe defendants’ true names, but argue that had they been aware of the defendants’ true names, they likely could have obtained the records identifying the defendants through discovery within the limitations period. That may be, but it does not foreclose the possibility that Plaintiffs presently seek. Taking into account these factors, the court cannot conclude that there was undue delay in Plaintiffs’ seeking the amendment or that there will be undue prejudice to the defendants occasioned thereby. In sum, these particular factors do not militate against Plaintiffs’ proposed amendment to their complaint.

The only factor which might call for a denial of Plaintiffs’ motion is possible “futile amendment,” which is inextricably intertwined with the relation-back issue. Thus, were Rule 15(c)(1)(A) controlling, Plaintiffs’ proposed amendment might be deemed futile given its “but for” language. For all the reasons explicated, however, Rule 15(c)(1)(A) applies. According to Rule 15(c), a proposed amendment to the complaint can readily be found to relate back to the original complaint, thereby avoiding the statute of limitations barrier upon which the City and Fitchet seek to interpose.

What does the court mean here?

5. Truthfulness & Good Faith

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 11

Signing Pleadings, Motions, and Other Papers; Representations to the Court; Sanctions

(a) Signature. Every pleading, written motion, and other paper must be signed by at least one attorney of record in the attorney's name—or by a party personally if the party is unrepresented. The paper must state the signer's address, e-mail address, and telephone number. Unless a rule or statute specifically states otherwise, a pleading need not be verified or accompanied by an affidavit. The court must strike an unsigned paper unless the omission is promptly corrected after being called to the attorney's or party's attention.

(b) Representations to the Court. By presenting to the court a pleading, written motion, or other paper—whether by signing, filing, submitting, or later advocating it—an attorney or unrepresented party certifies that to the best of the person's knowledge, information, and belief, formed after an inquiry reasonable under the circumstances:

(1) it is not being presented for any improper purpose, such as to harass, cause unnecessary delay, or needlessly increase the cost of litigation;

(2) the claims, defenses, and other legal contentions are warranted by existing law or by a nonfrivolous argument for extending, modifying, or reversing existing law or for establishing new law;

(3) the factual contentions have evidentiary support or, if specifically so identified, will likely have evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery; and

(4) the denials of factual contentions are warranted on the evidence or, if specifically so identified, are reasonably based on belief or a lack of information.

(c) Sanctions.

1. In General. If, after notice and a reasonable opportunity to respond, the court determines that Rule 11(b) has been violated, the court may impose an appropriate sanction on any attorney, law firm, or party that violated the rule or is responsible for the violation. Absent exceptional circumstances, a law firm must be held jointly responsible for a violation committed by its partner, associate, or employee.

(2) Motion for Sanctions. A motion for sanctions must be made separately from the motion and must describe the specific conduct that allegedly violates Rule 11(b). The motion must be served under Rule 5, but it must not be filed or be presented to the court until the challenged paper, claim, defense, contention, or denial is withdrawn or is corrected within 21 days after service or within another time the court sets. If the court awards sanctions, the court may award to the prevailing party the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, incurred for the motion.

(3) On the Court's Initiative. On its own, the court may order an attorney, law firm, or other person to show cause why conduct specifically described in the order has not violated Rule 11(b).

(4) Nature of a Sanction. A sanction imposed under this rule must be limited to the conduct that gives rise to the violation. The purpose of the sanction is to deter repetition of the conduct or comparable conduct by others similarly situated. The sanction may include nonmonetary directives; an order to pay a penalty intended to deter repetition of the conduct; an order to correct the conduct; or an order directing payment by the movant of part or all of the reasonable attorney's fees and other expenses directly related to the conduct that gave rise to the violation.

(5) Limitations on Monetary Sanctions. The court must not impose a monetary sanction:

(A) against a represented party for violating Rule 11(b)(2); or

(B) on its own, unless it issued the show-cause order under Rule 11(c)(3) before the final disposition of the case, if the court determines that the dismissal or settlement of the claims made by or against the party that the attorneys are, to be sanctioned.

(6) Requirements for an Order. An order imposing a sanction must describe the conduct that gives rise to the violation, describe the conduct that gives rise to the violation, and explain the basis for the sanction.

(d) Inapplicability to Discovery. This rule does not apply to disclosures and discovery responses, objections, and motions under Rules 26 through 37.

5.1 Factual & Legal Foundation

Turton v. Virginia Dept. of Education, No. 3:14-cv-00015-RDP (E.D. Va. Jan. 15, 2015)

ROBERT E. PAYNE, Senior District Judge.

This matter is before the Court on DEFENDANT PATRICK T. ANDRIANO'S MOTION FOR SANCTIONS TO RULE 11. For the reasons set forth herein, the motion will be granted.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Counsel for the 28 plaintiffs in this case filed the Amended Complaint on July 11, 2014. The Complaint generally alleges various incidents of discrimination against black and special education students in a number of local school divisions and includes both federal and state law claims. The Virginia Department of Education, Chesterfield, Essex, Henrico, and Nottoway County Public Schools, specific principals and teachers, and two attorneys, including Patrick T. Andriano ("Andriano"), the proponent of the current Motion for Rule 11 Sanctions, are among those named as defendants in the suit.

Andriano is an attorney with Reed Smith, LLP "who represented the Henrico and Chesterfield County School Boards regarding issues with Individualized Education Plans ("IEP") developed for five of the Plaintiffs who are or were students in certain public schools in either Henrico County or Chesterfield County." The Amended Complaint asserted claims against Andriano "individually and in his official capacity as counsel for school districts in Central Virginia, including Henrico County Public Schools, Chesterfield County Public Schools, Essex County Public Schools and Nottaway County Public Schools."

The Amended Complaint alleges that Andriano was "present in many IEP meetings in Henrico and Chesterfield Counties wherein he advised school officials to violate federal and state special education laws. . . ." It is then alleged that Andriano's actions and omissions "resulted in conspiracy to violate federal and state education laws, and amounted to Negligence, Gross Negligence, Reckless Disregard, and/or Breach of Duty Arising from Special Relationship. Specifically, the acts and omissions attributed to Andriano and alleged in the Amended Complaint include:

1. Denying parents access to their child's school records;
2. Advising school officials to conduct IEP meetings when parents were not present and did not waive their right to present in violation of federal law;
3. Advising school officials that it was appropriate to bring criminal charges against parents who were vocal about the violations of federal and state education laws related to their children and who disagreed with placement decisions made by the school IEP team;
4. Engaging in conduct in IEP meetings that essentially amounted to the bullying and harassment of parents who tried to participate in the meeting;
5. Advising school officials to disregard the recommendations of a treating physician with regard to the needs of the SPED student; and
6. Conspiring with officials to deny students their right to a FAPE (free appropriate public education) in the least restrictive environment

Many of the Defendants, including Adriano, filed Motions to Dismiss based on various legal theories.

After considering these motions, this Court entered an Order dismissing the Amended Complaint as to all defendants without prejudice on September 23, 2014. In so doing, the Court found that the Complaint violated Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) (2) and Fed R. Civ. P. 10(b). The motions to dismiss pursuant to Rules 12(b)(1) and/or 12(b)(6) were denied as moot.

Andriano filed his Motion for Rule 11 Sanctions on September 9, 2014, before the Order dismissing the Amended Complaint was entered, and the Order provides that: "the Court retains jurisdiction to decide Defendant Patrick T. Andriano's Motion for Sanctions pursuant to Rule 11."

LEGAL STANDARD UNDER RULE 11

Fed. R. Civ. P. 11 provides in relevant part:

By presenting to the court a pleading the attorney or unrepresented party is certifying best of that person's knowledge, information, and belief formed after an inquiry reasonable circumstances:

1. it is not being presented for any improper purpose, such as to harass, cause unnecessary and needless increase the cost of litigation;
2. the claims, defenses, and other legal contentions are warranted by existing law or for good cause, not made for an improper purpose, such as to harass, cause unnecessary and needless increase the cost of litigation, or to delay a trial or needless increase the cost of litigation;
3. the factual contentions have evidentiary support or, if specifically so identified, will provide evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery.

Violation of any one of these prescriptions is sufficient to trigger the mandatory injunction or sanction. Andriano argues that Plaintiffs and their attorneys have violated all three.

In situations like these where multiple types of Rule 11 violations are alleged, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure instructs that district courts consider whether the claims advanced in the pleading have a foundation in fact or is well grounded in law. The court must consider supported by the facts and the law (or a reasonable argument for extending, modifying, or reversing the law) before making a determination of improper purpose. That approach is based on the understanding that the inquiry under Rule 11(b)(1) does not influence the determination of the signer's purpose. Additionally, the inquiry under Rule 11(b)(2) and (b)(3) is based on the understanding that the inquiry under Rule 11(b)(1) which focuses on the signer's central purpose for filing the pleading, is somewhat different from the inquiry under Rule 11(b)(2) and (b)(3), both of which focus on the reasonableness of the signer's inquiry into the factual and legal bases for the claim(s).

When sanctions are sought pursuant to Rule 11(b) (2) and (b) (3), the standard is one of reasonableness" and the court must focus on "whether a reasonable attorney in similar circumstances could believe his actions to be factually and legally justified." When conducting this analysis, the court is tasked with assessing "what was reasonable to believe at the time the pleading was filed." As the rule itself indicates, the relevant circumstances must be considered, including the signer's subjective beliefs and factors such as time pressures and attorney experience may influence the reasonableness determination. If, pursuant to this analysis, the court determines that the signer "failed to conduct a reasonable inquiry into the applicable law" and/or facts prior to filing the pleading or motion at issue, Rule 11 sanctions are mandated.

When a sanction is sought under Rule 11(b) (1), the assessment is made using a different standard of reasonableness" in that it is not appropriate to consider the "consequences of the signer's act, subjectively viewed by the signer's opponent." However, it is appropriate to consider the signer's subjective beliefs to determine the signer's purpose in filing the suit, if those beliefs are revealed through an admission that the signer knew the motion or pleading was filed it nonetheless."

The text of Rule 11 teaches that “to harass or to cause unnecessary delay or needless increase in the costs of litigation” are all examples of improper purposes. However, those examples are not exclusive. The governing principle is that a complaint must be filed with the sincere and central purpose of vindicating rights in court. If not, its purpose is improper under Rule 11. When a complaint is filed for the proper purpose of vindicating rights and one or more other purposes of which the Court “does not approve,” sanctions are only appropriate if “the added purpose is undertaken in bad faith or is so excessive as to eliminate a proper purpose.”

DISCUSSION

Andriano argues that the claims against him: (1) lack legal basis; (2) lack factual basis; and (3) were filed for an improper purpose. He also notes that Plaintiffs and their counsel were put on notice after the Amended Complaint was filed that their claims against him lacked factual and legal support, but that they nevertheless continued to pursue those claims. Andriano now seeks Rule 11 Sanctions, asking this Court to “enter an order imposing the maximum sanctions permitted by law against plaintiffs and their counsel.”

A. Alleged Lack of Legal Basis

Andriano argues that the claims against him lacked legal basis because: (1) the Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over the claims against him; and (2) the claims are “fatally flawed as a matter of law.”

First, Andriano argues, as he did in his Motion to Dismiss Pursuant to Rule 12(b)(1), that this Court “lacks diversity jurisdiction and lacks federal question jurisdiction to adjudicate purely state law claims brought by Virginia residents against a Virginia resident.” Plaintiffs concede that their claims against Mr. Andriano “are in the form of state law claims,” but argue that the claims against Mr. Andriano “are so intertwined with the conduct involved in the federal law claims outlined in the Amended Complaint, that they must be reviewed in conjunction with the federal matters.” Adriano’s jurisdictional argument fails because the Amended Complaint was based on federal question jurisdiction as to defendants other than Adriano and because 28 U.S.C. § 1337(a) provides for pendant party jurisdiction over Adriano. And, supplemental jurisdiction over claims against a non-diverse party exists if the supplemental claim at issue arises from the same case or controversy i.e., “if the state and federal claims derive from a common nucleus of operative fact” and are such that “the plaintiff would ordinary be expected to try all of them in one judicial proceeding.”

Plaintiffs’ counsel frames her argument on the subject matter jurisdiction issue by asserting that there was a “direct correlation” between the asserted federal claims against other defendants and that the claims against Adriano were “intertwined” with those other claims. It thus appears that a reasonable attorney in like circumstances could have similarly believed that there was subject matter jurisdiction over the claims brought against Adriano.

Second, Andriano argues that the Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction because Plaintiffs failed to exhaust all administrative remedies before filing suit. Plaintiffs provide an explanation for why they did not exhaust all administrative remedies, citing the number of students whose rights were repeatedly and egregiously violated. Specifically, Plaintiffs contend that it would have been “futile” to seek a remedy in an administrative proceeding and argues for “a new exception of federal law in the Fourth Circuit to include a much needed exception to the requirement to exhaust all administrative remedies.” That argument, as to its merits, is unsupported by citation to decisional law. Counsel’s cogitation that an exception is needed to the settled exhaustion doctrine cannot be the basis upon which to conclude that an exception is warranted under legal principles. Thus, the Court cannot find that there was a reasonable cause for the failure to exhaust administrative remedies.

Third, Andriano argues that Plaintiffs’ state law claims against him lack legal basis because they cannot be based on a reasonable inquiry into the applicable law. However, the only state law claim that Andriano found worthy of a detailed review is the claim based on “breach of fiduciary duty arising from a special relationship.” On that point, Andriano asserts that “even a cursory review of the applicable Virginia law would have revealed to Plaintiffs’ counsel that no such fiduciary relationship could ever exist.” In support, Andriano cites numerous Virginia decisions that hold that, “in providing legal representation, an attorney’s sole duty is to his or her client and not to any third party.” Based on the fundamental nature of this “bedrock rule,” Andriano asserts that “Plaintiffs’ counsel either knew the applicable law and chose to ignore it, or failed to even conduct even the most basic research to determine what the applicable law is.”

Andriano also correctly asserts that, “at no point have plaintiffs identified what research they claim was performed prior to filing the Complaint or Amended Complaint.” The Court finds that Mr. Andriano is correct.

The law of Virginia is quite clear on this subject. Plaintiff’s counsel has not shown that any prefilings or legal research was undertaken in an effort to find legal support for the “breach of fiduciary duty arising from a special relationship” assertions in the Amended Complaint. And, given the clear and settled law of Virginia law on the subject, it is difficult to conclude that any such research was undertaken. Therefore, this record then, the Court finds that there was no prefilings inquiry into the law that supports the special relationship assertions in the Amended Complaint.

B. Factual Basis

Next, Andriano asserts that Plaintiffs’ claims against him are factually unsupported. Andriano argues that the “Complaint fails to set forth specific factual allegations to support Plaintiffs’ purported claims” and Plaintiffs’ counsel failed to make an effort to demonstrate that their claims are factually supported. Andriano argues that it is not enough that Plaintiffs’ counsel asserted that Mr. Andriano was “present at certain unspecified meetings and that he provided legal services to his clients.”

In response, Plaintiffs’ counsel asserts that counsel attended fifty or more IEP meetings, and that Andriano was present ten or more times, and counsel has recordings of the meetings evidencing Andriano’s attempt to bully, harass, and intimidate parents and impede school administrators and teachers to violate federal law. In addition, Plaintiffs’ counsel asserts that Andriano spent “in excess of 200 hours attending IEP meetings, reviewing school records, and attending documents and meetings with parents.”

That record shows a substantial basis for the allegations about Adriano's presence at, and his observed conduct during, some of the meetings alleged in the Amended Complaint. However, the record now shows that the allegation that Adriano was not counsel for the School Board of Essex and Nottoway Counties. Thus, "even a cursory investigation" would have revealed that Adriano did not represent the school boards for either Nottoway County or Essex County and that he was not involved in the development of IEPs for the student-plaintiffs attending schools in those counties. In sum, there was not an adequate investigation into the factual basis for allegations to the contrary.

C. Improper Purpose

Finally, Adriano argues that Plaintiff's claims against him are not asserted for any proper purpose. In support, Adriano cites the fact that plaintiffs sought monetary damages in excess of $20,000,000.00 based on "putative claims that do not contain common factual issues or common questions of law." Additionally, Adriano suggests that, if Plaintiffs truly had a proper purpose in filing their Complaint, they would not have failed to exhaust administrative remedies, would not have waited until some of the student-plaintiffs failed to be enrolled in the defendant school systems, and would not have sought such an exorbitant sum of money. Id.

Adriano alleges that Plaintiffs "primary motives were to gain publicity, and to embarrass teachers, principals, and state and county officials." Id. Of course, if that allegation is true, sanctions would be mandated because the only proper central purpose for filing a complaint is to vindicate rights in court, not to gain publicity or embarrass officials into acting as Plaintiffs' counsel think they should. To support his contention, Adriano cites counsel's public statements which include, "We took a chance because there was not a lot of case law on doing something like this, but something had to be done to wake up the defendants and get the information out there."

Adriano cites Kunstler as an example of a similar case where the "primary motives in filing the complaint were to gain publicity, to embarrass state and county officials..." However, in Kunstler, the "district court concluded that plaintiffs' counsel never intended to litigate the § 1983 action," and that determination clearly supported the award of sanctions based on improper purpose. Here, it is not clear that Plaintiffs never intended to follow through with and litigate their claims against Adriano, and the Court cannot conclude that counsel used the threat of litigation as a mere bargaining chip.

As discussed above, the subjective views of Adriano about Plaintiffs' purpose in filing the suit are irrelevant to the analysis. Rather, the Court must determine Plaintiff's purpose based on objective or otherwise reliable evidence. There is no direct evidence on which to make such a finding. However, the Court's findings on the existence of reasonable factual and legal support for claims can affect the analysis under this prong of Rule 11. In that regard, where "counsel willfully files a baseless complaint, a court may properly infer that it was filed. . .for some purpose other than to vindicate rights through the judicial process."

D. Are Sanctions Appropriate?

Given the findings that there was a lack of legal support for, and a lack of legal inquiry into, the special relationship theory that lies at the core of claims against Adriano, and considering the public statements of Plaintiffs' counsel, the Court concludes that sanctions are appropriate.

E. Appropriate Sanction(s) and Possible Need for a Hearing

Sanctions under Rule 11 may be monetary or nonmonetary, and only "the least severe sanction that is adequate to serve the purposes of Rule 11" should be imposed. The case law makes clear that the primary purpose of Rule 11 is to deter improper litigation rather than to compensate the opposing party for the costs of defending the lawsuit. In fashioning a sanction, the court must consider: (1) the reasonableness of the opposing party's attorney's fees; (2) the minimum amount of the award; (3) ability to pay; and (4) factors related to the severity of the Rule 11 violation. The court may also "consider factors such as the offending party's history, experience, and ability to prevail in the violation, the degree to which malice or bad faith contributed to the violation, the potential for chilling, the type of litigation involved, and other factors as deemed appropriate under the circumstances."

There is not a sufficient record on which to make the determination of what an appropriate sanction would be. Counsel shall confer and advise the Court, by January 31, 2002, as to what record can be framed. Alternatively, counsel could agree on a sanction and present it for consideration.

5.2 Good Faith Arguments for Change in Law

Hunter v. Earthgrains Co. Bakery, 281 F.3d 144 (CA-4 Cir. 2002)

KING, Circuit Judge.

By Order of October 23, 2000, appellant Pamela A. Hunter, a practicing attorney from Charlotte, North Carolina, and an active member of the North Carolina State Bar, was suspended from the practice in the Western District of North Carolina for five years. Ms. Hunter challenges her suspension, imposed upon her pursuant to Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. As explained below, we conclude that her appeal has merit, and we vacate her suspension of her right to practice by the district court.

I.

Ms. Hunter, along with her co-counsel N. Clifton Cannon and Charlene E. Bell, represented a group of workers at a Charlotte, North Carolina, bakery owned by appellee Earthgrains Co. Bakery ("Earthgrains"). These three lawyers filed a class action lawsuit against Earthgrains on February 24, 1997, in the Superior Court of Mecklenburg County (the "First Lawsuit").

action complaint, verified by the three named plaintiffs, alleged violations of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and it also asserted fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of Earthgrains in the closing of its Charlotte bakery. Earthgrains promptly removed the First Lawsuit to the Western District of North Carolina.

Earthgrains responded to the class action complaint on April 15, 1997. The plaintiffs thereafter filed certain motions in the district court, specifically: (1) seeking certification of the class; (2) to amend the complaint; (3) to amend the motion for class certification; and (4) for intervention by other plaintiffs. The plaintiffs also filed responses to several motions made by Earthgrains. Throughout the wrangling concerning the various motions, Ms. Hunter and her co-counsel maintained certain essential assertions, including: (1) that a pattern and practice of racial discrimination existed at Earthgrains' Charlotte bakery; (2) that the workers there were more skilled, but paid less, than those at other Earthgrains bakeries; (3) that the hourly wage workforce at the Charlotte bakery was predominantly African-American, while the workforce at other Earthgrains bakeries was predominantly white; and (4) that Earthgrains management had represented to its Charlotte employees that the Charlotte bakery was profitable and would remain open after a corporate spinoff, but that it was nonetheless closed. The plaintiffs alleged various incidents of racial discrimination by Earthgrains, including an assertion by an Earthgrains manager that he wanted to change the "complexion" of the workforce in the Charlotte bakery. Earthgrains denied the allegations of the First Lawsuit and moved for summary judgment, contending, first, that its Charlotte employees were bound to arbitrate their Title VII claims under their collective bargaining agreement (the "Earthgrains CBA"); second, that the plaintiffs had failed to establish a prima facie case of racial discrimination; and third, that if a prima facie case had been shown, the plaintiffs had failed to rebut Earthgrains' legitimate nondiscriminatory reasons for closing its Charlotte bakery. In response, the plaintiffs consistently asserted, inter alia, that the Earthgrains CBA did not apply to the Title VII claims at issue.

By Order entered on April 22, 1998, the district court awarded summary judgment to Earthgrains. It concluded that the plaintiffs were obligated to arbitrate under the Earthgrains CBA, and alternatively, that they had failed to rebut the nondiscriminatory reasons proffered by Earthgrains for the closing of its Charlotte bakery. Further, the court determined that the plaintiffs had failed to establish a prima facie case of fraudulent misrepresentation under North Carolina law. The court included in its Order a sua sponte directive that plaintiffs' lawyers show cause why Rule 11 sanctions should not be imposed on them for their conduct in the First Lawsuit (the "Show Cause Order").^[20] On May 6, 1998, the lawyers responded to the Order, seeking reconsideration of the summary judgment decision and requesting a stay of the Show Cause Order pending their appeal of the summary judgment award. By Order of July 21, 1998, the stay was granted and reconsideration of the summary judgment was denied.

On February 9, 1999, Ms. Hunter and Mr. Cannon filed another lawsuit against Earthgrains in North Carolina state court concerning the closing of the Charlotte bakery. This complaint (the "Second Lawsuit") was not of the class action variety, but instead named individual plaintiffs and alleged the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation under North Carolina law. In response,

Earthgrains filed its own lawsuit in the Western District of North Carolina, seeking under 28 U.S.C. § 2281 (the Anti Injunction Act), and asserting that the Second Lawsuit constituted a collateral attack on the summary judgment awarded to Earthgrains in 1998. The Second Lawsuit was voluntarily dismissed on May 4, 1999.

On April 21, 1999, this Court affirmed the summary judgment award to Earthgrains that plaintiffs had failed to rebut the legitimate, nondiscriminatory rationale of Earthgrains for the closing of its Charlotte bakery, and also concluding that plaintiffs failed to make a prima facie showing of fraudulent misrepresentation under North Carolina law. In reaching that decision, we explicitly declined to address whether the plaintiffs were required by the arbitration clause in Earthgrains CBA to submit their claims to arbitration.

On May 3, 2000, Ms. Hunter filed another complaint against Earthgrains in North Carolina federal court (the “Third Lawsuit”), this time alleging the tort of negligent misrepresentation under North Carolina law. The Third Lawsuit, which Earthgrains promptly removed to the District of North Carolina, arose from the same essential facts and circumstances as the earlier cases. Thereafter, on October 23, 2000, the district court concluded that jurisdiction was lacking, and it remanded the Third Lawsuit to state court.

For over two years, from May 1998 until June 2000, no action was taken with respect to the Show Cause Order of April 22, 1998. On June 16, 2000, however, Earthgrains filed a motion in the same court seeking Rule 11 sanctions against Ms. Hunter and her co-counsel, entitled “Motion for Rule 11 Sanctions Pursuant to Show Cause Order” (the “Sanctions Motion”). The bases for the motion were twofold: (1) the Fourth Circuit had affirmed summary judgment for defendants in the First and Second Lawsuits, and (2) plaintiffs’ lawyers (Ms. Hunter in particular) had filed two subsequent lawsuits on the same facts. On July 17, 2000, Ms. Hunter and her co-counsel filed a “Memorandum in Opposition to the Sanctions Motion,” pointing out that the Show Cause Order related only to the First and Second Lawsuits, and referring the court to their response to the Show Cause Order, filed on June 16, 2000, as establishing their compliance with Rule 11.

On October 23, 2000, the district court entered the order we are called upon to review on appeal. Finding the attorneys’ behavior to be sanctionable, the court barred Ms. Hunter from the practice of law in the Western District of North Carolina for a period of five years, reprimanded Ms. Hunter’s co-counsel, and it admonished them “to be conscious of the need to abide by the provisions of Rule 11 in the future.” The court based its Sanctions on the following:

- a. first and foremost, counsel’s assertion of a legal position contrary to the holding of our 1996 decision in Austin v. Owens-Brockway Glass Container, Inc., 78 F.3d 875 (4th Cir.1996), which the court characterized as “frivolous legal contention.”
- b. counsel’s lack of judgment and skill; and
- c. Ms. Hunter’s sanction by the same court eleven years earlier.

Ms. Hunter has timely appealed the suspension imposed upon her, maintaining that the sanctions are unwarranted and that her suspension from practice was an overly severe punishment. We possess jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

II.

B.

Although Rule 11 does not specify the sanction to be imposed for any particular violation of its provisions, the Advisory Committee Note to the Rule's 1993 amendments provides guidance with an illustrative list. A court may, for example, strike a document, admonish a lawyer, require the lawyer to undergo education, or refer an allegation to appropriate disciplinary authorities. While a reviewing court owes "substantial deference" to a district court's decision to suspend or disbar, it is axiomatic that asserting a losing legal position, even one that fails to survive summary judgment, is not of itself sanctionable conduct.

Under Rule 11, the primary purpose of sanctions against counsel is not to compensate the prevailing party, but to "deter future litigation abuse."^[21] Importantly, a sua sponte show cause order deprives a lawyer against whom it is directed of the mandatory twenty-one day "safe harbor" provision provided by the 1993 amendments to Rule 11.^[22] In such circumstances, a court is obliged to use extra care in imposing sanctions on offending lawyers. The Advisory Committee contemplated that a sua sponte show cause order would only be used "in situations that are akin to a contempt of court," and thus it was unnecessary for Rule 11's "safe harbor" to apply to sua sponte sanctions. Furthermore, when imposing sanctions under Rule 11, a court must limit the penalty to "what is sufficient to deter repetition of such conduct," and "shall describe the conduct determined to constitute a violation of this rule and explain the basis for the sanction imposed."

Fed.R.Civ.P. 11(c).^[23]

²¹ (n.7 in opinion) The circumstances involving Ms. Hunter are unusual in that the notion of sanctions was first raised by the court in April 1998. However, sanctions were not imposed until after a motion was filed more than two years later by Earthgrains. This distinction is important because, as we shall explain, differing standards apply.

²² (n.8 in opinion) The "safe harbor" of Rule 11 forbids filing or presenting a motion for sanctions to the court "unless, within 21 days after service of the motion, the challenged paper is not withdrawn or appropriately corrected." Fed.R.Civ.P. 11(c)(1)(A).

III.

B.

The primary basis for the suspension of Ms. Hunter is that she advanced a frivolous legal position in the First Lawsuit. By presentation of a pleading to a court, an attorney is certifying under Rule 11(b)(2), that the claims and legal contentions made therein "are warranted by existing law or by a nonfrivolous argument for the extension, modification, or reversal of existing law or the establishment of new law." In its Sanctions Order, the district court found the legal assertions of Ms. Hunter to be "utter nonsense" that were "paradigmatic of a frivolous legal contention."

We have recognized that maintaining a legal position to a court is only sanctionable when, in "applying a standard of objective reasonableness, it can be said that a reasonable attorney in like circumstances could not have believed his actions to be legally justified." That is to say, as Judge Wilkins recently explained, the legal argument must have "absolutely no chance of success under the existing precedent." Although a legal claim may be so inartfully pled that it cannot survive a motion to dismiss, such a flaw will not in itself support Rule 11 sanctions — only the lack of any legal or factual basis is sanctionable. We have aptly observed that "the Rule does not seek to stifle the exuberant spirit of skilled advocacy or to require that a claim be filed before a complaint can be filed. The Rule attempts to discourage the needless filing of lawsuits.” And we have recognized that “creative claims, coupled even with a few inconsequential facts, may merit dismissal, but not punishment.”

In its Sanctions Order, the court maintained, with respect to Ms. Hunter, that her standing to file suit was challenged based on a binding arbitration clause in the Earthgrains’ CBA. Plaintiffs’ response to this gateway issue rested on a tenuous, if not preposterous, argument that the CBA and applicable law.” The court was correct that the legal position it found in Austin that a collective bargaining agreement (“CBA”) arbitration clause must contain specific language to mandate arbitration of a federal discrimination claim — had been rejected by the circuit earlier in Austin v. Owens-Brockway Glass Container, Inc. However, our reasoning in Austin, issued on April 22, 1998 (when the Show Cause Order issued), stood alone on one side of a circuit split. Most of our sister circuits (the Second, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Tenth, and Eleventh) had taken a position contrary to Austin on whether a CBA could waive an individual employment discrimination cause of action. In point of fact, and consistent with the foregoing, none of our sister circuits, issued in April 1998, had agreed with the position we took in Austin.

The circuit split evidenced by these decisions concerned whether collective bargaining agreements containing general language required arbitration of individuals’ statutory claims such as those arising under the ADEA and Title VII. The disagreement of the circuits resulted from varying interpretations of the Court’s decisions in Alexander v. Gardner, Gilligan v. General Electric Co., and Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp.^[24] This Court, in Austin, held Gilmer to be the controlling authority, while the other circuits chose the alternate view of the Court’s decision in Alexander to control.

In opposition to Earthgrains’ summary judgment motion, Ms. Hunter repeatedly cited the Supreme Court’s decision in Alexander (failing, however, to rely on the decision of the circuits that had followed Alexander). She further sought to align her case against Austin with Alexander by discussing the generality of the applicable clause of the Earthgrains’ CBA which included the agreement not to “illegally discriminate.” She contended that this provision was not sufficiently specific to require her clients to arbitrate.

The district court was particularly concerned with Ms. Hunter’s attempt to distinguish Austin from our decision in Brown v. Trans World Airlines. She maintained to the court that the court had distanced itself from Austin on essentially the same facts, and she inferred the court’s reluctance of our Brown panel to follow Austin. Ms. Hunter argued that, as in Brown, the provisions of the collective bargaining agreement which allegedly proscribed discrimination, do not mention Title VII, 42 U.S.C. § 1981 or common law fraud,” and that the language of the collective bargaining agreement between plaintiffs and defendants was sufficient to require plaintiffs to first arbitrate their claim.” Earthgrains contended, on the other hand, that the agreement “not to illegally discriminate” in the Earthgrains CBA did not require arbitration of Title VII claims under Austin. The district court agreed with Earthgrains and suspended its suspension of Ms. Hunter largely on this legal contention. As we have pointed out, ^{24.}(n.16 in opinion) In its 1974 decision in Alexander, the Court determined that an employee who had filed a grievance in accordance with a CBA did not forfeit a Title VII discriminatory discharge lawsuit, and it distinguished between contractual and statutory rights. In 1991, the Court concluded in Gilmer that there was a presumption of arbitrability, and that an age discrimination claim could be subject to compulsory arbitration. Ms. Hunter, in response to the Show Cause Order, explained her basis for the First Lawsuit by making the pertinent observation that Gilmer involved an individual employment contract, while Alexander concerned arbitration under a CBA. She accordingly asserted that the Alexander decision controlled in the First Lawsuit.

there was a good-faith basis for Ms. Hunter to assert the position she propounded. We would be reaching to conclude that, as of 1998, Ms. Hunter's position had "no chance of success" under existing law. And subsequent legal developments render Ms. Hunter's position on the Austin issue not only tenable, but most likely correct.

On November 16, 1998 — nearly two years before the Sanctions Order of October 23, 2000 — the Supreme Court decided that, in order for a CBA to waive individuals' statutory claims, it must at least "contain a clear and unmistakable waiver of the covered employees' rights to a judicial forum for federal claims of employment discrimination." Wright v. Universal Mar. Serv. Corp., 525 U.S. 70 (1998). The Court declined to address whether even a clear and unmistakable waiver of the right to take one's statutory discrimination claim to court would be enforceable. It also observed that "the right to a federal judicial forum is of sufficient importance to be protected against less-than-explicit union waiver in a CBA," and that a clause requiring arbitration of "matters under dispute" was not sufficiently explicit to meet the standard. The Court distinguished its earlier decision in Gilmer on the basis that Gilmer involved "an individual's waiver of his own rights, rather than a union's waiver of the rights of represented employees," and thus it was not subject to the "clear and unmistakable standard." When the district court suspended Ms. Hunter for advancing a legal position that was "not the law of this circuit," it was itself propounding a legal proposition in conflict with the Supreme Court's Wright decision.²⁵ (n5) After Wright was decided in 1998, and prior to the Sanctions Order of October 2000, our Court examined CBA provisions similar to the one at issue in this case. It found that they did not compel plaintiffs to arbitrate.

In Blue v. United States Dept. of Army, we had occasion to address a Rule 11 sanctions issue in a similar, but distinguishable, context. We there affirmed an award of sanctions where the attorneys had pursued a claim after it became clear that it was factually without merit. Of significance, the plaintiffs' counsel had espoused a legal position contrary to circuit precedent (regarding the necessary showing for a prima facie case of discrimination), but arguably more consistent with Supreme Court authority. In Blue, the district court recognized that the question of law at issue was "in a state of flux," and it declined to impose Rule 11 sanctions based on the legal contention being asserted. In this appeal, the suspension of Ms. Hunter was in large part premised on her legal contention on the arbitrability of discrimination claims under the Earthgrains CBA, a legal position being asserted in connection with a body of law that was "in a state of flux." Indeed, the district court sanctioned Ms. Hunter for advocating a legal proposition supported by a majority of our sister circuits, which was later substantially adopted by the Supreme Court.

In pursuing the First Lawsuit, Ms. Hunter, under Rule 11(b)(2), was plainly entitled (and probably obligated),²⁶ to maintain that Austin was incorrectly decided. While she could expect the district court to adhere to Austin, she was also entitled to contemplate seeking to have this court, en banc, correct the error (perceived by her) of its earlier Austin decision. If unsuccessful, she might then have sought relief in the Supreme Court on the basis of the circuit split. Indeed, our good Chief Judge, in his Blue decision, observed that if it were forbidden to argue a position contrary to precedent, the parties and counsel who in the early 1950s brought the case of Brown v. Board of Ed., might have been thought by some district court to have engaged in sanctionable conduct for pursuing their claims in the face of the contrary precedent of Plessy v. Ferguson. The civil rights movement might have died aborning.

This astute observation of Judge Wilkinson is especially pertinent in the context of the district court's erroneous view of the law in its suspension of Ms. Hunter necessarily being an abuse of discretion. Although Ms. Hunter and the other lawyers (i.e., her co-counsel and the lawyers for Earth-grains) failed to provide the court with a thorough exposition of the split and the Supreme Court's decision in Wright, their lack of thoroughness does not make her position frivolous. Because Ms. Hunter's legal contentions in the First Lawsuit on the issue of arbitrability were not frivolous, her suspension from practice in the Western District of North Carolina on this basis does not withstand scrutiny.

5.3 Improper Purpose

Sussman v. Bank of Israel, 56 F.3d 450 (2d Cir. 1999)

KEARSE, Circuit Judge

Nathan Lewin, Esq., an attorney for the plaintiffs herein whose complaint was dismissed by the court on the ground of forum non conveniens, appeals from so much of a judgment of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, as imposed a $50,000 sanction against him. Lewin pursuant to Fed. R.Civ.P. 11 and the court's inherent power on the ground that the complaint, signed by Lewin, had been filed in part for an improper purpose. The court held that, although plaintiffs were also motivated in part by a proper purpose, the preponderance of evidence showed that the improper purpose warranted the imposition of sanctions. On appeal, Lewin contends that the court erred in holding (1) that the criticized purpose was not improper, and (2) that sanctions could not be imposed because the claims asserted in the complaint were not frivolous. Defendants cross-appeal, contending that the sanctions should have been more severe. For the reasons set forth below, we agree with Lewin that the award of sanctions was an abuse of discretion. We therefore reverse the judgment and dismiss the cross-appeal.

I. BACKGROUND

For the purposes of this appeal, the events are not in dispute. The plaintiffs are Ervin Sussman, a Swedish citizen who resides in the United States, and Ira Guilden and the estate of Ira Guilden (Guilden and/or the estate referred to as "Guilden"). In 1984, Sussman, a Swedish citizen who lives in the United States, and Guilden, a Swedish citizen who resided in New York, were founders, directors, and shareholders of Naveh Bank Ltd. ("NAB"), an Israeli bank. Defendants are the Bank of Israel ("BOI"), which absorbed NAB, NAB's depositors, and several other Israeli entities and individuals.

A. The Collapse of NAB and the Litigation in Israel

In 1985, NAB collapsed after years of fraud, embezzlement, and mismanagement by its managers in Israel. BOI made payments to NAB depositors and obtained the appointment of the Official Receiver of the State of Israel (the "Receiver") to liquidate NAB's remaining assets. In 1989, the Receiver commenced a civil action in Israel in the name of the State of Israel against NAB's officers and directors, including Sussman and Guilden, for their role in the collapse of NAB.

“Israeli action”), naming as defendants Sussman, Guilden, and several other officers and directors of NAB, and alleging, inter alia, that the NAB directors had been negligent and had breached their fiduciary duties by failing to monitor adequately the management of NAB and to ensure that NAB operated in compliance with Israeli banking regulations. The Receiver’s complaint sought recovery from the defendants, jointly and severally, of more than $100 million dollars to compensate for losses allegedly incurred by BOI as a result of NAB’s collapse.

Sussman and Guilden, represented by Israeli counsel, raised affirmative defenses to the Receiver’s claims and asserted third-party claims against BOI and two of its officials. In addition to alleging that BOI and the officials had been negligent in failing to carry out their supervisory duties with respect to NAB, the third-party claims alleged that BOI and the officials had deliberately misrepresented NAB’s financial condition and concealed from NAB’s non-Israeli directors certain financial transactions stemming from a 1983 banking scandal in Israel, which came to be known as the “Bank Shares Crisis” following revelations that many Israeli banks were artificially and unlawfully inflating the market prices of their respective shares. The third-party claims alleged that BOI and the Israeli Ministry of Finance (the “Ministry”) had sought to avert the financial collapse of NAB by extending it a secret $10 million loan in order to allow NAB’s senior managers to continue their manipulation of NAB’s stock price; that the third-party-defendant officials, despite learning of the NAB managers’ improper activities, had continued to misrepresent NAB’s situation to its nonresident directors and sought to prevent public disclosure of BOI’s role in the NAB stock-manipulation scheme; and that NAB would not have collapsed but for the actions of BOI and the defendant officials. Sussman and Guilden sought contribution and indemnification for any amounts that they might be required to pay in the Israeli action.

B. The Preparation and Filing of the New York Complaint

Thereafter, Sussman and Guilden retained Lewin, a partner in the Washington, D.C. law firm of Miller, Cassidy, Larroca & Lewin, to investigate the circumstances underlying the Israeli suit and to evaluate the prospects for further litigation against BOI and other Israeli officials involved in the events at NAB. In 1991, as the Israeli action was nearing its scheduled trial date, Lewin drafted a complaint to be filed in New York (the “New York complaint”), naming as defendants BOI; the Ministry; three BOI officials, including the two named as third-party defendants in the Israeli action; and Bank Hapoalim, Ltd. (“Bank Hapoalim”), an Israeli bank with a branch office in New York.

The New York complaint substantially repeated Sussman and Guilden’s assertions in the Israeli action that BOI and its officials had helped NAB managers to manipulate the price of NAB stock following the Bank Shares Crisis. It also alleged that the secrecy of the scheme was maintained by routing the Ministry’s clandestine $10 million loan to NAB through Bank Hapoalim’s New York office; that BOI and Ministry officials contemporaneously assured Sussman that NAB was well-managed and financially stable, thereby inducing him not to sell his NAB shares; that BOI knew that the directorships held by NAB’s foreign investors were largely honorary and that the investors were relying on BOI to monitor NAB’s Israeli operations; and that Sussman and Guilden had relied on the representations of BOI and the Ministry in not taking action to protect their investments. The complaint also alleged that the filing of the Israeli action was itself a continuing scheme to force Sussman and Guilden to bear the costs of BOI's failure, fraud and mismanagement at NAB. Sussman and Guilden sought, inter alia, damages of $67 million for the lost value of their investments in NAB.

Before filing the complaint, Lewin sent identical letters dated May 30, 1991 (the "warning letter"), to several Israeli government officials, including then-Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, then-Minister of Finance Yitzchak Modai, and BOI Governor Michael Breuer. The letter informed them of Sussman and Guilden's intention to bring the present suit, and proposed discussions. After describing the general nature of the charges contained in the draft complaint, the letter stated:

This is a matter of extreme urgency because, in the absence of any satisfactory resolution of our differences, the lawsuit will be filed in New York within the next ten days. The agents of the Government of Israel that are engaged in an effort directed against our clients are also proceeding with a trial in the Jerusalem District Court that is scheduled to begin shortly.

If this controversy erupts into public view with the filing of our lawsuit and the inception of an Israeli proceeding, it will not only result in a grave injustice to individuals who have been among Israel's most constant and generous supporters, but will seriously damage foreign investment in Israel in the future.

The letter further asserted that Sussman and Guilden "were, at most, honorary directors of NAB" and that they had had no involvement in the improper activities of NAB's management. It asserted that they had "relied on BOI and its inspectors to supervise NAB and to insure that its business was conducted properly". It then concluded:

The case now pending in Jerusalem is the culmination of years in which improprieties at NAB and American Bank were overlooked or deliberately ignored by the Bank of Israel. It is grossly unfair for the Bank of Israel now to shift the blame for its own conduct to individuals who have supported Israel emotionally and financially and seek to hold these foreign supporters liable for an amount exceeding 200 million shekalim, for the losses caused by the failure of NAB.

In addition to the loss of their investments, which amounted to millions of dollars, our clients estimate that they have been forced to spend in excess of one million dollars fighting baseless claims made in the Israeli courts. Our lawsuit in federal court in New York will seek recovery from the Ministry of Finance, the Bank of Israel and individual government officials for these losses and other harm caused to our clients.

Our clients have heretofore been reluctant to take the step of filing suit because a full airing of the outrageous conduct by the Government of Israel will surely deter many potential foreign investors who might otherwise be interested in lending financial resources to Israel. However, the gravity of this injustice and the relentless prosecution of the case in Jerusalem leaves them no choice.

If you believe that discussions on this subject can lead to a fruitful and mutually satisfactory resolution, I am prepared to come to Jerusalem promptly to meet with you.

In response to the letter, Amihud Ben-Porath, an Israeli attorney representing BOI, responded to Lewin and requested a copy of the draft complaint. Lewin sent a copy with a June 3, 1991 letter stating, "I have not, in our conversation, overstated my clients' anger at how they have been treated in Israel, and I hope you appreciate it and are able to communicate this to your clients."

¹Equivalent to about U.S. $67 million in 1995.

Maybe we can save both our clients much travail." Ben-Porath thereafter met with Lewin, Sussman, and Guilden in New York and talked with Lewin several times by telephone. After Ben-Porath advised Lewin that Israeli officials were unwilling to settle the dispute and withdraw the Israeli action, Lewin filed the New York complaint on June 17, 1991.

C. The District Court Proceedings

1. The Dismissal of the New York Complaint

In lieu of an answer, BOI moved to dismiss the New York complaint on numerous substantive and procedural grounds, but principally argued the ground of forum non conveniens. In opposition to the forum non conveniens motion, plaintiffs argued, inter alia, that some evidence available to them in the New York action, including Sussman's own testimony, would be unavailable in Israel. They stated that Sussman could not travel to Israel to testify without the risk of being detained there by the Israeli government; Sussman stated in an affidavit that his prior requests of defendants and other Israeli government officials for a guarantee of safe passage into and out of Israel for that purpose had been denied.

"Forum non conveniens is a discretionary power that allows courts to dismiss a case where another court, or forum, is much better suited to hear the case. This dismissal does not prevent a plaintiff from re-filing his or her case in the more appropriate forum. This doctrine may be invoked by either the defendant, or by the court." Wex Legal Dictionary.

The district court dismissed on the forum non conveniens ground. While acknowledging that the forum preferences of Sussman, a United States resident, and Guilden, a deceased American citizen whose estate was being administered in New York, were entitled to some degree of deference, the court held that other factors pointed to Israel as the more appropriate forum. It noted principally that all of the claims in the New York complaint would be governed by Israeli law; that Sussman and Guilden had voluntarily elected to invest in Israel; and that parallel litigation arising out of the same alleged conduct was already proceeding there. The court rejected Sussman and Guilden's contention that their claims arose out of the alleged secret $10 million loan transmitted through Bank Hapoalim's branch in New York, concluding that the New York conduct "cannot be regarded, in the overall scheme of things, as other than peripheral" to alleged acts and omissions "occurring entirely in Israel." The court also rejected the contention that an Israeli court would be predisposed against Sussman and Guilden's claims. It concluded that, in light of the complexity of the case and the interests of international comity, the claims in the New York complaint presented "a quintessential case for application of the forum non conveniens doctrine." The court did not otherwise address the substance of Sussman and Guilden's allegations; rather, it conditionally dismissed the New York complaint "without prejudice to the merits of plaintiffs' claims."

The court imposed two conditions on the grant of dismissal. First, it required defendants to waive any statute-of-limitations defense under Israeli law that might have become available after the commencement of the New York action. Second, the court required the Israeli government to provide Sussman with "written assurances" that he would not be detained in Israel should he travel there for the purpose of defending the Israeli action or of asserting claims covered by the New York complaint. Defendants complied with the court's conditions, and the complaint was dismissed. An appeal by Sussman and Guilden from the dismissal was rejected in a per curiam opinion.

2. The Rule 11 Motion and the Sanctions Award

Following this Court's affirmance of the forum non conveniens dismissal, BOI appealed to the district court for an award of sanctions pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 11, 18 U.S.C. § 1927, and inherent power. They argued (a) that the New York lawsuit had been instituted for "an improper purpose," and (b) that the New York complaint and other papers filed by Sussman "contained numerous arguments lacking factual and legal basis."

The district court granted the motion to the extent of imposing sanctions of $500,000 on Lewin pursuant to Rule 11 and the court's "inherent power to deal with abusive litigation." The court declined to rule on BOI's contention that the allegations of the complaint were unsubstantiated, noting that it "did not reach the merits in dismissing the complaint on forum non conveniens grounds, and declining to expend more judicial resources in examining the merits now." Rather, it imposed its sanctions "based solely" on what the court described as the manifestly improper purpose which played a significant part in plaintiffs' motivation for filing their complaint".

In finding an improper purpose, the court quoted extensively from Lewin's May 1991 letter and his June 1991 letter to Ben-Porath and found that they were designed to pressure the Israeli government into withdrawing from the Jerusalem action by threatening the Israeli government with negative publicity that would result in "economic damage to Israel." While acknowledging that Rule 11 may be imposed only for an abusive "pleading, motion, or other paper," and that Lewin's letters do not fall within the scope of the Rule, the court stated that Lewin's strategy was an "abuse of the litigation process," and that the letters provided "powerful evidence of the improper purpose for which the New York complaint was filed." In addition, the court noted that Lewin's "prediction" of adverse publicity "came to pass with Mr. Lewin as a result." The court cited an article in the June 18, 1991 edition of the Jerusalem Post, quoting Lewin as saying that NAB's foreign investors "were very badly treated by the Israeli court system." The court also cited an October 31, 1991 New York Times article quoting Lewin as saying, "The message is clear: if you lend your name to anything in Israel, you can no longer be sure that some lawyer and his lawyers will not come after you with huge liabilities." The district court stated that the filing of a complaint in a highly doubtful venue, for the express purpose of putting pressure on a foreign government to drop or compromise that government's action against them in the foreign nation's courts, furnishes a stark example of improper and oppressive conduct. That proposition seems to me self-evident. I see no need to discuss the many cases cited in voluminous briefs on this motion. The issue is intensely fact-oriented.

Plaintiffs protest that their purpose in filing the complaint was to secure an American forum for their fraud claims against defendants. They say the purity and fixity of their purpose can be inferred from the vigor with which they litigated their right to do so in this Court and the Court of Appeals. I accept that plaintiffs were also motivated by their forum preference, and that did not go gently from it. It is commonplace, however, that the law recognizes multiple motives in human behavior. In this case plaintiffs had two motives. One was to pressure the Israeli Government to cease prosecution of the Jerusalem action against them by threatening to file, and then filing, a sensational complaint against the Government in New York. The other motive was to obtain American jurisdiction if the threats failed, as in fact they did. The conduct inspired by this motive was improper.

After noting that the decision as to where an action is to be filed is “essentially a legal decision” typically made by a plaintiff’s attorney, the court declined to sanction plaintiffs themselves and imposed the sanctions solely against Lewin. The court also indicated that the amount of the sanction was not intended to compensate defendants for the expense of defending the action in New York but rather was meant to deter similar filings.

Lewin has appealed the award of sanctions. Defendants have cross-appealed, contending that the amount of the award should have been higher.

II. DISCUSSION

On appeal, Lewin contends that the sanctions award should be overturned because (1) the goal of pressuring BOI to withdraw or settle the Israeli action was not an improper purpose, and (2) even if such a purpose were improper, the filing of a complaint that is well grounded in fact and warranted by existing law cannot, as a matter of law, furnish a valid basis for the imposition of sanctions. Defendants seek to have sanctions upheld not only on the basis adopted by the district court but also on the grounds that the claims asserted in the complaint were frivolous; that the choice of New York as a forum was likewise frivolous because it “lacked any legitimate reason,”; and that the court should have awarded sanctions under 28 U.S.C. § 1927 on the ground that the filing of the New York complaint unreasonably and vexatiously multiplied litigation. They also argue that the award of sanctions should have been higher.

We review all aspects of a district court’s award of sanctions under an abuse-of-discretion standard, giving recognition to the premise that “the district court is better situated than the court of appeals to marshal the pertinent facts and apply the fact-dependent legal standard” that informs its determination as to whether sanctions are warranted. We nonetheless remain mindful that “a district court would necessarily abuse its discretion if it based its ruling on an erroneous view of the law or on a clearly erroneous assessment of the evidence.”

Under this standard of review, we find that the imposition of sanctions in the present case constituted an abuse of discretion. The district court erred as a matter of law (a) in concluding that it is improper for an attorney to file a nonfrivolous complaint in a new and proper forum partly as a means of enhancing his client’s chances of obtaining the settlement of another pending action, and (b) in concluding that sanctions may be imposed for the filing of a complaint that not only is not found to be frivolous but also wins for the plaintiff a measure of judicially imposed relief.

A. Rule 11 Sanctions

The pre-1993 version of Rule 11, which is applicable to the present case, provided that an attorney’s signature on a “pleading, motion, or other paper” constituted a certification that to the best of the signer’s knowledge, information, and belief formed after reasonable inquiry it is well grounded in fact and is warranted by existing law or a good faith argument for the extension, modification, or reversal of existing law, and that it is not interposed for any improper purpose, such as to harass or to cause unnecessary delay or needless increase in the cost of litigation.

This version of the Rule, with the exception of technical changes, was adopted in 1983. Prior to 1983, Rule 11 contemplated the imposition of sanctions only upon a finding that a party had filed a nonfrivolous complaint which resulted in the court's award of some benefits to plaintiffs. The 1983 revision of the Rule substituted an objective standard of reasonableness. In Eastway, we rejected the notion that an attorney who filed an objectively unreasonable court paper could escape the imposition of sanctions by asserting that he had a good faith subjective belief in its validity; and in Oliveri v. Thompson, we rejected the proposition that a court paper that was not objectively unreasonable could form the basis for the imposition of sanctions where the attorney was guilty of only a subjective violation of the Rule. As discussed below, we conclude that the award of sanctions in the present case did not violate the objective standard.

2. Improper Purpose as Sanctionable

The question remains whether the court could properly impose sanctions for filing a nonfrivolous complaint which resulted in the court's award of some benefits to plaintiffs on the basis of its finding that plaintiffs also had a purpose that was not proper. This Court has squarely addressed the question. In one case we stated that "even if there is an arguable legal and factual basis for a motion, an attorney or party violates Rule 11 by presenting it to the court for an improper purpose," but that statement was dictum, since we overruled the award of sanctions because the challenged motion had a reasonable legal basis and the court had not found an improper purpose. In a latter decision, we expressly declined to answer the question "of whether a complaint that is warranted by existing law may be sanctioned for the improper purpose of harassment," because in that case the complaint both had a good faith basis and had been filed to harass.

An objective standard of analysis is required even with respect to whether a filing was made for an improper purpose. Thus, the court is not to "dive into the attorney's subjective motivation for filing the paper, but rather should assess such objective factors as whether particular papers or proceedings caused delay that was unnecessary, whether they caused an increase in the cost of litigation that was needless, or whether they lacked any apparent legitimate purpose. Findings on these points would suffice to support an inference of an improper purpose. The court can make such findings guided by its experience in litigation, its knowledge of the standards of the bar of the court, and its familiarity with the case before it, and by referring to relevant criteria under the Federal Rules such as those in Rule 1 and Rule 26(b)(1).

It is crucial to the effectiveness of Rule 11 that this approach be followed. Were a court to conduct inquiries into subjective bad faith, it would invite a number of potentially harmful consequences, such as generating satellite litigation, inhibiting speech and chilling advocacy.

If a reasonably clear legal justification can be shown for the filing of the paper in question, an improper purpose can be found and sanctions are inappropriate.

The courts have expressed somewhat divergent views as to whether an improper purpose warrants the imposition of sanctions for a nonfrivolous filing. The Seventh Circuit has held that "filing a colorable suit for the purpose of imposing expense on the defendant, or for the purpose of winning" would be sanctionable under Rule 11. Several other circuits have distinguished between complaints and other court papers, taking the view that, whatever the analysis applicable to motions and other papers filed after the commencement of the litigation, special care must be taken to avoid penalizing the filing of a nonfrivolous complaint, for otherwise a plaintiff who has a valid claim may lose his right "to vindicate his rights in court".

In Townsend v. Holman Consulting Corp, the Ninth Circuit's analysis was as follows:

Although the "improper purpose" and "frivolousness" inquiries are separate and distinct, they will often overlap since evidence bearing on frivolousness or non-frivolousness will often be highly probative of purpose. The standard governing both inquiries is objective. With regard to complaints which initiate actions, we have held that such complaints are not filed for an improper purpose if they are non-frivolous. Since subjective evidence of the signer's purpose is to be disregarded, the "improper purpose" inquiry subsumes the "frivolousness" inquiry in this class of cases. The reason for the rule regarding complaints is that the complaint is, of course, the document which embodies the plaintiff's cause of action and it is the vehicle through which he enforces his substantive legal rights. Enforcement of those rights benefits not only individual plaintiffs but may benefit the public, since the bringing of meritorious lawsuits by private individuals is one way that public policies are advanced. It would be counterproductive to use Rule 11 to penalize the assertion of non-frivolous substantive claims, even when the motives for asserting those claims are not entirely pure.

A determination of improper purpose must be supported by a determination of frivolousness when a complaint is at issue.

We are in agreement with the Townsend analysis, especially in circumstances such as those present here, where the court not only did not find the claims to be objectively unreasonable but imposed restrictions on defendants in an effort to ensure that plaintiffs would have an adequate opportunity to have their claims adjudicated on the merits. A party should not be penalized for or deterred from seeking and obtaining warranted judicial relief merely because one of his multiple purposes in seeking that relief may have been improper.

3. Whether the Criticized Purpose Was Improper

Finally, we turn to the question of whether the finding that there was an improper purpose was correct. The district court held that the filing of the complaint with a view to exerting pressure on defendants through the generation of adverse and economically disadvantageous publicity reflected an improper purpose. To the extent that a complaint is not held to lack foundation in law or fact, we disagree. It is not the role of Rule 11 to safeguard a defendant from public criticism that may result from the assertion of nonfrivolous claims. Further, unless such measures are needed to protect the integrity of the judicial system or a criminal defendant's right to a fair trial, a court's steps to deter attorneys from, or to punish them for, speaking to the press have serious First Amendment implications. Mere warnings by a party of its intention to assert nonfrivolous claims, with predictions of those claims' likely public reception, are not improper.

Nor do we think it was appropriate for the district court to find that Lewin's prelitigation letters were evidence that the New York complaint was filed for an improper purpose. It is hardly unusual for a would-be plaintiff to seek to resolve disputes without resorting to legal action; prelitigation letters airing grievances and threatening litigation if they are not resolved are commonplace, sometimes with salutary results, and do not suffice to show an improper purpose if nonfrivolous litigation is eventually commenced. Indeed, it would be ironic to hold that Rule 11 sanctions may be awarded based solely on evidence that the plaintiff has given to a warning that the complaint will be filed unless an allegedly tortious lawsuit is withdrawn. In light of the fact that the current version of Rule 11 itself, see Fed. R.Civ.P. 11(c)(1) (eff. Dec. 1, 1993), essentially forbids the filing of a motion for sanctions unless the movant gives the opponent a warning that such a motion will be filed if the allegedly sanctionable conduct is withdrawn.

B. Inherent Power

A court has the inherent power to supervise and control its own proceedings and to punish counsel or a litigant for bad-faith conduct. While Rule 11 extends only to papers filed in federal court, the court's inherent power is broader and would permit the court to impose sanctions on the basis of related bad-faith conduct prior to the commencement of the litigation. However, the imposition of sanctions for bad faith obviously entails an inquiry that is at least partially subjective. We conclude that the court's use of its inherent power in the present case was an abuse of discretion, for the court's expressed goal of deterrence was inappropriate in respect to a complaint whose merits were not addressed and whose filing properly entitled the court to grant some relief to the plaintiffs.

We note that the award of sanctions would have been no more supportable if the court had been designed to compensate defendants for attorneys' fees and other expenses. Under the American rule, it is that a prevailing party in federal court litigation cannot recover attorneys' fees, and an exception for bad-faith conduct may be made only where there is "clearly established law" that the claims "are entirely without color and made for reasons of harassment or for other improper purposes." Even assuming that defendants could be regarded as the prevailing parties in this controversy whose merits have not been determined, defendants did not make an exception to the American Rule since they did not persuade the district court that the claims asserted in the New York complaint were without color.

Finally, we note that though defendants sought sanctions under 28 U.S.C. § 1927 as well as under Rule 11 and the court's inherent power, arguing that the filing of the complaint had harassed and vexatiously multiplied the litigation, the court plainly did not treat the present case as being congruent with the Israeli action, for it refused to dismiss the New York action under § 1927 and instead granted plaintiffs relief that they had previously been unable to obtain from the defendants. In the circumstances, it cannot be concluded that the filing of the complaint either was in bad faith or caused "delay that was unnecessary" or initiated "delay that was needless" or without "any apparent legitimate purpose." The court properly denied defendants' request for an award of sanctions under § 1927.

CONCLUSION

We have considered all of defendants' arguments in support of sanctions and have concluded that they must fail. Defendants' argument that the court's award of sanctions to plaintiffs must be set aside because the court failed to consider one of the bases proffered below, defendants' cross-appeal, arguing that the sanctions should have been more severe, is moot.

So much of the judgment as imposed sanctions against Lewin is reversed. The cross-appeal is dismissed.

6. Review Questions

Question 1

Guy Mackendrick was injured while attending a party at the office of Sterling Cooper, P.C., a New York advertising agency that handles advertising for Mackendrick's business. During the party, a Sterling Cooper employee named Lois Sadler, who was drunk, drove over Mackendrick's foot with a John Deere riding lawnmower.

As a result of this incident, Mackendrick has lost all of the toes on his left foot. He will require reconstructive surgery and extensive physical therapy. He has also experienced recurring nightmares about the incident, and has developed a morbid fear of garden tools, leaving him unable to enjoy his previous hobby of gardening.

Mackendrick hires you to represent him in a suit over his injury. You conclude that Mackendrick has two viable claims:

- a. A claim against Sadler for her negligence in operating the mower. Under the applicable law, this claim requires that the plaintiff show (1) that the defendant breached a duty of care owed to the plaintiff, (2) that the plaintiff suffered harm, and (3) that the defendant's breach was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.
- b. A claim against Sterling Cooper seeking to hold them vicariously liable for Sadler's negligence ("respondeat superior"). Under the applicable law, this claim requires that the plaintiff show that (1) the plaintiff was injured by an employee of the defendant, (2) that the employee was acting within the scope of their employment, and (3) that the employee's activity benefitted the employer.

What facts must you allege in the complaint to satisfy the pleading requirements under the FRCP? Are there any additional facts, beyond those provided above, that you would need?

Question 2

After working at the Sterling Cooper advertising agency for about 18 months, Peggy Olson was very much surprised when her boss, Don Draper, called her into his office and told her she was being fired for poor performance. Olson believes the real reason was her rejection of Don's repeated and unwelcome advances.

Olson sues Sterling Cooper in federal court, asserting a claim for wrongful termination in breach of her employment contract. Assume that the court has personal and subject matter jurisdiction.

Olson's complaint includes the following allegations:

1. Olson entered into a contract of employment with Sterling Cooper on January 1, 2018.
2. Olson's contract provides that she is to be employed by Sterling Cooper for a term of three years.
3. Olson's contract further provides that, during the stated term of employment, Sterling Cooper will not terminate her employment without cause, and that "cause for termination includes, but is not limited to, employee misconduct, dishonesty, or unsatisfactory performance of assigned tasks."
4. On July 30, 2019, Don Draper, managing director of Sterling Cooper and Olson's supervisor, called Olson into his office. Draper told Olson, "Peggy, you're fired," and handed her a letter stating that her employment was terminated effective immediately. The letter did not provide a reason for the termination of Olson's employment.
5. Before leaving Draper's office, Olson asked why she was being fired. Draper told Olson, "I've got my eye on you. If you play right, you will have a bright future at this place." Olson responded, "I'm not satisfied with my performance. Leave my office, pack your things, and get out of here."
6. Prior to her conversation with Draper on the day she was fired, Olson had received only one negative performance review, which was due to a lack of feedback from Draper. Olson had received no complaints about her work performance. To the contrary, Olson received a substantial merit-based bonus in December 2018, based on her performance in the previous year. In February 2019, Draper told Olson, "I've got my eye on you. If you play right, you will have a bright future at this place."
7. Defendant fired Olson without cause, in breach of her employment contract.
8. As a proximate and foreseeable result of Defendant's breach, Olson has suffered financial loss and severe emotional distress.

Under Hudson state law, the elements of a claim for wrongful termination in violation of an employment contract are as follows:

- The plaintiff was employed by the defendant under an express (written or oral) contract for a definite time period.
- The contract expressly provided that the employer could not terminate the plaintiff during the stated term without cause.
- The employer terminated the plaintiff's employment without cause during the contract term.

Sterling Cooper moves to dismiss for failure to state a claim under FRCP Rule 12(b)(6). Plaintiff argues that the allegations in the complaint are sufficient to state a claim for breach of contract.

Should the court grant the motion to dismiss?

Question 3

Frank Sobotka, a dockworker at the Port of Baltimore, was injured in a collision while operating a forklift he was operating. The forklift was being operated by another dockworker, Vernon Motley. Sobotka sued Baltimore Pier, contending that the company was liable because it owned the forklift and that Motley was its employee.

Sobotka filed a Complaint, which included the following paragraph:

¶5. A motor-driven vehicle known as a forklift or chisel, owned, operated and controlled by the defendant, its agents, servants and employees, was so negligently and carelessly managed that the same did come into contact with the plaintiff causing him to sustain the injuries more fully hereinafter set forth.

Sobotka and his attorney based these allegations on the fact that the forklift was marked "B.P.I." and that Motley told Sobotka he was employed by BPI. In fact, BPI had sold its freight-moving operations to another company, Charm City Contractors (CCC), several months before the accident. BPI continued to own the forklift, but leased it to CCC. Following the sale of operations, BPI's freight-moving employees, including Motley, became CCC's employees. However, for some reason, Motley was unaware of that change.

BPI and CCC were insured by the same company, Harbor Liability, Inc. (HLI). CCC had reported the accident to HLI, which opened a claim. Upon receiving the complaint, BPI forwarded it to HLI, noting that Motley was employed by CCC at the time of the accident and suggesting that CCC, rather than BPI, should be the proper defendant.

BPI then filed an Answer, in which it responded as follows:

¶5. Defendant denies the averments of paragraph 5.

In the course of discovery, Sobotka first learned about the sale of BPI's operations to CCC, the lease of the forklift, and the change in Motley's employment status. By this time, the statute of limitations on any claims against CCC had run out.

Sobotka files a motion under FRCP Rule 11, on the grounds that BPI's general denial in response to ¶5 of the Complaint was not warranted by the evidence, since BPI knew it owned the forklift. As a sanction, Sobotka requests that the court strike BPI's denial and rule that, for purposes of the suit, BPI is deemed to admit each of the facts alleged in that paragraph.

BPI objects, and files its own motion for leave to amend its answer to admit that it owned the forklift and that Sobotka's injuries resulted from the collision, but deny that Motley was operating the forklift as BPI's employee.

Because more than 21 days have passed since BPI served its answer, the court may strike for a motion to strike under FRCP Rule 12(f): "Motion to strike. The court may strike from a pleading an insufficient defense or any redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter. The court may act: (1) on its own; or (2) on motion made by a party either before responding to the pleading or, if a response is not allowed, within 21 days after being served with the pleading."

How should the court rule?

Chapter 7

Claim & Issue Preclusion

1. General Principles

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 13

Requirement of Finality

The rules of res judicata are applicable only when a final judgment is rendered. However, for purposes of issue preclusion (as distinguished from merger and bar), “final judgment” includes any prior adjudication of an issue in another action that is determined to be sufficiently firm to be accorded conclusive effect.

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 14

Effective Date of Final Judgment

For purposes of res judicata, the effective date of a final judgment is the date of its rendition, without regard to the date of commencement of the action in which it is rendered or the action in which it is to be given effect.

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 15

Inconsistent Judgments

When in two actions inconsistent final judgments are rendered, it is the later, not the earlier, judgment that is accorded conclusive effect in a third action under the rules of res judicata.

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 16

Judgment Based Upon a Judgment That Is Subsequently Reversed

A judgment based on an earlier judgment is not nullified automatically by reason of the setting aside, or reversal on appeal, or other nullification of that earlier judgment; but the later judgment may be set aside, in appropriate proceedings, with provision for any suitable restitution of benefits received under it.

2. Claim Preclusion

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 17

Effects of Former Adjudication—General Rules

A valid and final personal judgment is conclusive between the parties, except on appeal or direct review, to the following extent:

- (1) If the judgment is in favor of the plaintiff, the claim is extinguished and no new claim may arise on the judgment (see §18);
- (2) If the judgment is in favor of the defendant, the claim is extinguished and the judgment bars a subsequent action on that claim (see §19);

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 18

Judgment for Plaintiff—The General Rule of Merger

When a valid and final personal judgment is rendered in favor of the plaintiff:

- (1) The plaintiff cannot thereafter maintain an action on the original claim or any claim arising out of the same transaction, although he may be able to maintain an action upon the judgment; and (2) In an action on the judgment, the defendant cannot avail himself of defenses he might have interposed, in the first action.

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 19

Judgment for Defendant—The General Rule of Bar

A valid and final personal judgment rendered in favor of the defendant bars another action by the plaintiff on the same claim.

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 20

Judgment for Defendant—Exceptions to the General Bar

(1) A personal judgment for the defendant, although valid and final, does not bar another action by the plaintiff on the same claim:

- (a) When the judgment is one of dismissal for lack of jurisdiction, for improper venue, or for nonjoinder or misjoinder of parties; or
 - (b) When the plaintiff agrees to or elects a nonsuit (or voluntary dismissal) without prejudice or the court directs that the plaintiff be nonsuited (or that the action be otherwise dismissed) without prejudice; or
 - (c) When by statute or rule of court the judgment does not operate as a bar to another action on the same claim, or does not so operate unless the court specifies, and no such specification is made.
- (2) A valid and final personal judgment for the defendant, which rests on the prematurity of the action or on the plaintiff's failure to satisfy a precondition to suit, does not bar another action by the plaintiff instituted after the claim has matured, or the precondition has been satisfied, unless a second action is precluded by operation of the substantive law.

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 21

Judgment for Defendant on His Counterclaim

(1) Where the defendant interposes a counterclaim on which judgment is rendered in his favor, the rules of merger are applicable to the claim stated in the counterclaim, except as stated in Subsection (2).

(2) Where judgment on a counterclaim is rendered in favor of the defendant, but he is unable to obtain full recovery in the action because of the inability of the court to render such a judgment and the unavailability of such devices as removal to another court or consolidation with another action in the same court, the defendant is not precluded from subsequently maintaining an action for the balance due on the claim stated in the counterclaim.

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 22

Effect of Failure to Interpose Counterclaim

(1) Where the defendant may interpose a claim as a counterclaim but he fails to do so, he is not thereby precluded from subsequently maintaining an action on that claim, except as stated in Subsection (2).

(2) A defendant who may interpose a claim as a counterclaim in an action but fails to do so is precluded, after the rendition of judgment in that action, from maintaining an action on the claim if:

(a) The counterclaim is required to be interposed by a compulsory counterclaim rule of court, or

(b) The relationship between the counterclaim and the plaintiff's claim is such that successful prosecution of the second action would nullify the initial judgment and impair rights established in the initial action.

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 23

Judgment for Plaintiff on Defendant's Counterclaim

Where the defendant interposes a claim as a counterclaim and a valid and final judgment is rendered against him on the counterclaim, the rules of bar are applicable to the judgment.

2.1 Judgment on the Merits

Johnson v. Spencer, 950 F.3d 680 (10th Cir. 2020)

HOLMES, Circuit Judge

In 2013, a Wyoming court declared Andrew Johnson actually innocent of crimes he was accused of committing. He was then incarcerated. In 2017, after his release, Mr. Johnson brought suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against the City of Cheyenne, Wyoming ("Cheyenne"), the Estate of Detective George Geisler ("the Estate"), and Officer Alan Spencer alleging that they were responsible for his constitutional rights that contributed to his conviction ("2017 Action"). While he had been released from prison, however, Mr. Johnson had unsuccessfully brought similar suits against Cheyenne and the Estate in 1991 ("1991 Action") and against Officer Spencer in 1992 ("1992 Action"). The question on appeal is what effect the judgments against Mr. Johnson in his 1991 and 1992 Actions have on his 2017 Action.

Cheyenne, the Estate, and Officer Spencer each moved the district court under Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) to dismiss the 2017 Action because its claims are precluded by the judgments in the 1991 and 1992 Actions. The district court granted those motions. Mr. Johnson's later motions for reconsideration of and relief from that dismissal were denied in part and reversed in part the district court's dismissal of the 2017 Action. More specifically, the Tenth Circuit affirmed the dismissal of the claims against Cheyenne and the Estate because they were defendants in the 1991 Action—in which they were the defendants—is entitled to claim-preclusive effect. It reversed, however, the dismissal of the claims against Officer Spencer because the judge erred in concluding that he was not entitled to claim-preclusive effect in the 1992 Action—in which he was the defendant—was not on the merits and, thus, is not entitled to claim-preclusive effect.

I. BACKGROUND

A. Factual Background

Late one night in June 1989, Mr. Johnson ran into a female acquaintance at a bar in Cheyenne and returned with her to the apartment that she shared with her boyfriend, who was away at the time. They drank wine and smoked marijuana in her living room, and Mr. Johnson used his driver's license and picture I.D., which were enclosed in a clear plastic sleeve, to separate marijuana leaves from their stems and seeds for the joints that they smoked. Mr. Johnson and his female acquaintance then left her apartment in her car and visited multiple bars in downtown Cheyenne. Mr. Johnson, however, forgot his license and picture I.D. on the coffee table in his acquaintance's living room.

The acquaintance eventually became sick and vomited in her car while Mr. Johnson was driving them to an after-hours club. When Mr. Johnson went inside the club to get some paper towels to clean up her vomit, the acquaintance climbed into the driver's seat and drove herself home. Mr. Johnson returned to find that his acquaintance and her car were gone. He then walked to his home, thirty-five minutes away, and went to sleep.

Later that night, from around 3:00 a.m. to 3:10 a.m., the acquaintance's downstairs neighbor heard aggressively loud, periodic knocking on the door to the stairs leading to the acquaintance's upstairs apartment. Eventually, she heard the door's glass window pane shatter, followed by footsteps crossing the broken glass and walking upstairs to the acquaintance's apartment. The neighbor heard the intruder walking around the acquaintance's apartment and then a woman screaming what sounded like "No, no!" The neighbor immediately called the police. While the neighbor was speaking to the police dispatcher, she heard the intruder walk back down the stairs, over the broken glass, and out of the building, less than ten minutes after breaking into the upstairs apartment.

When Officer Spencer and Officer Phillip Raybuck of the Cheyenne Police Department arrived about a minute later, they found the acquaintance whimpering hysterically in her bathroom with the door ajar. The rest of the apartment was dark. Officer Spencer later testified at trial that, when they asked the acquaintance to come out of the bathroom, she screamed at them, and it took him a moment to realize that she was repeatedly asking, "Is he still here?" The officers searched her apartment and found no one else. They told her that they were the only ones there and she could open the bathroom door. Officer Spencer testified that the acquaintance opened the door some more—revealing that her hair was mussed, her eyes were wet and red, and her robe was half undone—and she repeatedly said, "He hurt me."

According to Mr. Johnson, Officer Spencer must have taken his driver's license and picture I.D. off of the coffee table in the living room and, upon being told by the acquaintance that a man had "hurt" her, showed them to her, "prompting" her "to affirmatively assert Mr. Johnson was that man." Officer Spencer testified that it took him a while to understand what Mr. Johnson allegedly did to the acquaintance because she was still choked up and crying, but that she ultimately led him to believe that Mr. Johnson had sexually assaulted her.

Officer Spencer took the acquaintance to a local hospital where she was medically examined. She had a sexual-assault kit performed, resulting in the discovery of seminal fluid. Officers then went through the acquaintance's apartment taking photographs of the crime scene. Some of these photographs were provided to Mr. Johnson's trial counsel, but others were withheld.

Later that morning, Mr. Johnson was awakened by a police officer knocking on his door. The officer asked him if he had any knowledge about a burglary and sexual assault that had happened during the night. Mr. Johnson denied having any knowledge of the crime and was then arrested him and took him to jail.

Detective Stanford investigated the acquaintance's sexual-assault allegation. He took DNA samples from Mr. Johnson pursuant to a warrant and interviewed the acquaintance three times. At trial, he testified that the acquaintance called him two days after the assault and told him that she had found Mr. Johnson's eyeglasses in her bedroom. According to the acquaintance, she said, that he had worn at the bars they went to after leaving her apartment. Mr. Johnson claims that his glasses must have been "placed in my bedroom "by or on behalf of" the acquaintance.

At trial, the acquaintance testified that Mr. Johnson broke into her apartment and raped her. She also testified that Mr. Johnson had his I.D. card when they went barhopping after leaving her apartment because he produced his card to enter one of the bars. The prosecution, among other things, introduced testimony from Officer Spencer and Detective Stanford about the dried blood on Mr. Johnson's shirt, a photograph of Mr. Johnson's face, a picture I.D., and eyeglasses that were found in the apartment. An expert witness for the prosecution testified that, based on forensic testing, Mr. Johnson was "among the few individuals in the population who could have left the seminal fluid" recovered by the acquaintance in the sexual assault kit. The jury convicted Mr. Johnson of aggravated burglary and first degree sexual assault. The Supreme Court of Wyoming affirmed his conviction.

Mr. Johnson remained imprisoned for twenty-four years. Then, in August 2013, he was exonerated and declared actually innocent by a Wyoming court after improved DNA testing revealed that the seminal fluid samples in the acquaintance's sexual-assault kit did not match his DNA but did match the DNA of the acquaintance's then-boyfriend. According to Mr. Johnson, the Cheyenne Police Department should not have believed the acquaintance and her boyfriend when they told the police that the boyfriend was out of town for work on the night she was sexually assaulted.

B. Procedural Background

1. The 1991 Action

While incarcerated, Mr. Johnson filed at least two federal civil-rights actions in Wyoming. One was a suit he filed in the federal district court against those he claimed were responsible for his conviction. The second action was a suit he filed in forma pauperis in 1991 against the City of Cheyenne and Detective Stanford, among other parties. Within seven days of the filing of his original complaint, Mr. Johnson also filed a demand for a jury trial. He then amended his complaint, among other things, to assert, inter alia, that Cheyenne had failed to train its officers in proper methods of investigating sexual assaults and that Detective Stanford had violated his constitutional rights during the investigation, for example, the manner in which the detective interrogated him.

About a month after the defendants answered his amended complaint, Mr. Johnson requested a hearing on the complaint and a jury trial. The district court granted him an evidentiary hearing, but denied him a jury trial. At the hearing, Mr. Johnson objected to the court's denial of a jury trial, but his objection was overruled. Near the end of the hearing, the defendants argued that the case was ripe for summary judgment, and the district court responded that they could move for it. The district court also ordered the parties to submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. But before the district court entered any findings or conclusions, the case was transferred to another district judge, who, in turn, referred the case to a magistrate judge for a new evidentiary hearing. Mr. Johnson, however, did not object to the new hearing. And it appears that he did not renew his request for a jury trial before the new district judge.

At the beginning of the new evidentiary hearing, the magistrate judge denied the defendants' motions for summary judgment, which they had filed after the first evidentiary hearing, because there were genuine disputes of material fact. The magistrate judge indicated that he would be making the relevant findings of fact based on the evidence proffered at the hearing, and Mr. Johnson, again, did not object. The magistrate judge then conducted a bench trial and issued Findings of Fact and Recommendations, advising in the end "that Mr. Johnson's complaint be denied with prejudice." Mr. Johnson filed objections to the magistrate judge's report. The district court overruled his objections and adopted the magistrate judge's recommendations, dismissing Mr. Johnson's claims with prejudice.

Mr. Johnson appealed, and a panel of our court entered an order and judgment affirming the district court's judgment.

2. The 1992 Action

While his 1991 Action was pending, Mr. Johnson filed another federal civil-rights action—this time a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 suit against Officer Spencer. Mr. Johnson alleged that Officer Spencer had violated his due-process rights "by knowingly and willfully giving false testimony at his original jury trial" about the eyeglasses that his acquaintance said that he had worn and she had found in her bedroom. He also moved the district court for leave to proceed in forma pauperis.

Before Officer Spencer filed any responsive document, the district court entered an order sua sponte dismissing the complaint with prejudice as frivolous. The court noted that in the 1991 Action it had "concluded there were no facts justifying the plaintiff's claims that his constitutional rights were violated" with respect to the trial evidence about his eyeglasses, and that "the present complaint was simply another attempt by him to revisit the same claim that had previously been dismissed." The court reviewed the exhibits submitted with the complaint and determined that they did not "establish even the slightest indication that Officer Spencer had made false, or inconsistent, statements at the trial." The court held that "Plaintiff had made no new argument in his complaint and that the complaint was frivolous and completely devoid of merit." The court then went on to hold that, "even assuming Mr. Johnson's constitutional rights were violated by" Officer Spencer, any error was "harmless" in light of the strong evidence of guilt presented at Mr. Johnson's trial. The court described "the evidence and Officer Spencer's challenged testimony regarding the eyeglasses" as, "at best, extraneous and cumulative." It then "dismissed the complaint with prejudice as frivolous."

On appeal, we affirmed, noting that the district court had “dismissed the action frivolous under 28 U.S.C. § 1915(d).” In doing so, we stated that “Mr. Johnson’s law upon an indisputably meritless legal theory because a testifying police officer absolute immunity.” Thus, “dismissal was appropriate.”

3. The 2017 Action

After he was exonerated, Mr. Johnson filed a third federal civil-rights action, i.e., the under § 1983. He alleged that Cheyenne, Detective Stanford, Officer Spencer, and members of Cheyenne’s police department violated his constitutional rights. In p alleged that the defendants suppressed photographs of the crime scene that exonerated him, failed to preserve those photographs, fabricated evidence by p acquaintance to identify him as the intruder who broke into her apartment, and, as failed to have adequate policies and training for its officers.

In May 2017, Cheyenne and Officer Spencer separately moved to dismiss the complaint inter alia, that the claims against them were precluded by the judgments in the 1991 Actions, respectively. The Estate later filed its own motion to dismiss, raising, inter alia, preclusion with respect to the 1991 Action. The defendants each attached records from the proceedings to their motions.

In July 2017, the district court granted all three motions to dismiss. “Although Defendants asserted several bases for dismissal of Plaintiff’s claims against them,” the district court concluded, “res judicata, or claim preclusion, barred Plaintiff’s action and was therefore dispositive of Defendants’ motions to dismiss.” In particular, the district court concluded that the 1991 and 1992 Actions had resulted in final judgments on the merits against Mr. Johnson between the same parties as the 2017 Action, and had concerned the same transaction as the 2017 Action. The district court rejected Mr. Johnson’s argument that Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994)—which held that prisoners may not bring a § 1983 action that calls into question the lawfulness of their conviction until the conviction has been invalidated—implied that the judgments against him in his 1991 and 1992 pre-Heck Actions were not entitled to res judicata preclusive effect because his underlying conviction had not yet been invalidated. Because Mr. Johnson had yet to respond to the Estate’s motion to dismiss, the court granted the Estate’s motion to dismiss “because the res judicata analysis did not differ and was equally dispositive as to Defendants’ motions to dismiss.”

II. DISCUSSION

The central question in this appeal is whether the judgments in the prior litigation—specifically, the judgments in the 1991 and 1992 Actions—preclude Mr. Johnson’s conviction—i.e., the judgments in the 1991 and 1992 Actions—precluding him from bringing a new lawsuit—i.e., the 2017 Action—against the same defendants for his exoneration. The answer turns on the doctrine of claim preclusion. Claim preclusion bars a party from litigating a legal claim that was or could have been the subject of a previous final judgment.” For claim preclusion to apply, “three elements must exist: (1) a final the merits in an earlier action; (2) identity of parties or privies in the two suits; and (3) identity of the cause of action in both suits.” “Even if these three elements are satisfied, there is an exception to the application of claim preclusion where the party resisting it did not have a ‘full and fair opportunity to litigate’ the claim in the prior action.”

We address in Part B whether the judgments in the 1991 and 1992 Actions have claim-preclusive effect on the 2017 Action. We conclude that the judgment in the 1991 Action—in which Detective Stanford and Cheyenne were defendants—has claim-preclusive effect. But we conclude that the judgment in the 1992 Action—in which Officer Spencer was the defendant—does not have claim-preclusive effect because that case was not decided “on the merits.” We, thus, do the following: (1) reverse the district court’s order granting Officer Spencer’s Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss the 2017 Action and remand for further proceedings, and (2) affirm the district court’s order granting the Estate’s and Cheyenne’s Rule 12(b)(6) motions to dismiss the 2017 Action.

B. The Defendants’ Rule 12(b)(6) Motions in the 2017 Action

In the following discussion, we address (1) our standard of review, (2) the general framework governing claim-preclusion, and (3) how that law applies to the 1991 and 1992 Actions. We conclude that the district court correctly held that the 1991 Action has claim-preclusive effect on the 2017 Action, but erred in holding that the 1992 Action has such effect. We, thus, affirm in part and reverse in part.

2. Background Principles of Claim Preclusion

Before proceeding further into our de novo review, we pause to frame the applicable claim-preclusion doctrine. “The principle underlying the rule of claim preclusion is that a party who once has had a chance to litigate a claim before an appropriate tribunal usually ought not have another chance to do so.” “The preclusive effect of a federal-court judgment is determined by federal common law.” We require defendants to prove three elements to prevail on this defense: “(1) a final judgment on the merits in an earlier action; (2) identity of parties or privies in the two suits; and (3) identity of the cause of action in both suits.” “In addition, even if these three elements are satisfied, there is an exception to the application of claim preclusion where the party resisting it did not have a ‘full and fair opportunity to litigate’ the claim in the prior action.”

Although we have at times “characterized the ‘full and fair opportunity to litigate’ as a fourth requirement of res judicata,” we have since clarified that “the absence of a full and fair opportunity to litigate is more appropriately treated as an exception to the application of claim preclusion when the three referenced requirements are met.”

In this case, Mr. Johnson concedes that the district court correctly ruled that the second and third elements of claim preclusion are satisfied here. See Thus, the judgments in the 1991 and 1992 Actions will have claim-preclusive effect against Mr. Johnson so long as they were “on the merits” and he had a “full and fair opportunity to litigate.” Although Mr. Johnson argues that the 1992 Action did not provide him with a “full and fair opportunity to litigate,” we do not address the merits of that argument because, as explicated below, we agree with his contention that the district court erred in holding that the judgment in that action was “on the merits.” The 1992 Action, accordingly, should not have been given claim-preclusive effect. As for the 1991

Action, Mr. Johnson does not argue that the district court erred in concluding that it made a judgment “on the merits.” Consequently, we take up below solely the question whether Mr. Johnson had a “full and fair opportunity to litigate” his claims in the 1991 Action. We conclude that he did have such an opportunity. We, thus, affirm that aspect of the decision on claim-preclusion determination.

3. Application

In the following discussion, as indicated, we focus on whether the 1991 Action provided Mr. Johnson with a “full and fair opportunity to litigate” and whether the 1992 Action was adjudicated “on the merits.” As to the 1991 Action, we conclude that Mr. Johnson did not have a “full and fair opportunity to litigate” his claims because the decision to conduct a bench trial instead of a jury trial—i.e., the denial of a jury trial—ostensibly deprived him of that opportunity presented a procedural issue that he failed to raise on appeal. Mr. Johnson could have fully and fairly litigated his claims before the district court, but then waived on appeal, even though he could have fully and fairly litigated it there as well. As to the 1992 Action, in contrast, we conclude that Mr. Johnson correctly contends that the action was not adjudicated “on the merits” because the district court expressly dismissed it as frivolous under the then-applicable 28 U.S.C. § 1331. Accordingly, we affirm the district court’s dismissal of the claims precluded by the 1991 Action—i.e., those against the Estate and Cheyenne—but reverse its dismissal of the claims precluded by the 1992 Action—i.e., those against Officer Spencer.

a. The 1991 Action is entitled to claim-preclusive effect.

The parties dispute whether the 1991 Action is entitled to claim-preclusive effect, specifically, whether it constituted a “full and fair opportunity to litigate.” Mr. Johnson argues that, even if the 1991 Action might give rise to claim preclusion, Cheyenne and the Estate have failed to muster legally sufficient proof to establish this. We reject both arguments and, thus, uphold the district court’s dismissal of the claims against Cheyenne and the Estate, but reverse the denial of a full and fair opportunity to litigate by the district court with respect to the parties to the 1991 Action.

i. The “Full and Fair Opportunity to Litigate” Requirement

The “full and fair opportunity to litigate” inquiry is a “narrow exception” that “applies when the requirements of due process were not afforded—where a party shows ‘a denial of a full and fair opportunity to litigate would undermine the fundamental fairness of the original proceedings.’” “The fairness of a prior proceeding ‘is determined by examining any procedural limitations, the party’s ability to fully litigate the claim, and whether effective litigation was limited by the nature or conduct of the parties.’” Here, Mr. Johnson argues, that the district court’s decision in the 1991 Action to convene a bench trial instead of a jury trial was a procedural limitation that denied him a full and fair opportunity to litigate his claims. We disagree.

As we mentioned, the procedural limitation at issue here—i.e., the denial of a jury trial—is not the matter that Mr. Johnson fully litigated before the district court in the 1991 Action. Mr. Johnson has fully challenged on appeal, but failed to do. More specifically, after the district court denied Mr. Johnson’s motion for a jury trial and started to conduct an evidentiary hearing on his complaint instead, Mr. Johnson objected to that procedure in court. The district court overruled the objection. After his case was assigned to a new district judge, that judge entered for the defendants following a bench trial held about 10 months after the evidentiary hearing. Mr. Johnson appealed from the district court's judgment. Although he could have challenged the process that the district court afforded him, he failed to do so. The judgment in the 1991 Action then became final; any procedural challenges Mr. Johnson could have raised against it were waived by his failure to present them on appeal.

As the governing authorities make clear, it is enough for full-and-fair-opportunity-to-litigate purposes that the litigant had a full and fair opportunity to contest the procedural obstacle that ostensibly barred meaningful consideration of his claims. Mr. Johnson had that opportunity here. In this regard, our decision in Hanley v. Four Corners Vacation Properties, Inc., is instructive. In Hanley, the plaintiffs-appellants argued that a prior state judgment "was void and subject to collateral attack because of the lack of service of process." The defendants-appellees defended the prior judgment on the ground that "the due process issue pertaining to the alleged defect in service of process was fully litigated previously in state court, culminating in a judgment" against the plaintiffs-appellants. The district court "sustained the defense," holding that the prior judgment should be accorded claim-preclusive effect. We affirmed, stating that "it is well settled that where the issue of due process has been litigated and a final judgment entered, the determination of that issue, right or wrong, is res judicata." In reaching that holding, we reasoned that the plaintiffs-appellants' due-process concerns were litigated in state court, where "an adequate remedy was available through the state appellate process." And we concluded that the plaintiffs-appellants "have had their day in court on these issues and a final judgment entered thereon. They cannot relitigate them in federal court."

As in Hanley, so too here. Mr. Johnson had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the alleged procedural limitation—i.e., the denial of a jury trial—before the district court in the 1991 Action, and, after the court entered judgment, he had a full and fair opportunity to challenge the court's procedures on appeal before that judgment became final. The fact that he did not present a procedural challenge on appeal does nothing to diminish the opportunity that he had to do so; he simply lost his chance. Like the plaintiffs-appellants in Hanley, Mr. Johnson "had his day in court on this issue and a final judgment entered thereon." The district court, therefore, properly determined that he could not "relitigate" the issue in the 2017 Action.

In sum, it is clear to us that Mr. Johnson cannot escape from the claim-preclusive effect of the 1991 Action based on a procedural argument that was previously litigated and adjudicated in that action and that he had an opportunity to appeal before that judgment became final. Consequently, we reject Mr. Johnson's contention that the 1991 Action did not provide him with a "full and fair opportunity to litigate."

ii. Cheyenne and the Estate carried their burden on the claim-preclusion defense.

Mr. Johnson also contends that, even if the 1991 Action could give rise to claim preclusion, Cheyenne and the Estate have failed to muster legally sufficient proof to establish this. We reject this argument.

Mr. Johnson argues that “even if the 1991 Action could give rise to claim preclusion, the defendants failed to prove claim preclusion in their Rule 12(b)(6) motions.” As a threshold matter, we note that much of this argument appears based on the fact that the district court relied on language included in the complaint, but we have already explained that the district court’s jurisdiction over its own records was permissible. Further, because Mr. Johnson is only challenging the district court’s claim-preclusion ruling with respect to the 1991 Action on the ground that he was not given a “full and fair opportunity to litigate” his claims there, we most appropriately analyze his current lack-of-proof argument through that limited lens.

That said, we recognize that Mr. Johnson’s argument appears to grow out of the law as it has developed in our earlier cases about whether the full-and-fair-opportunity-to-litigate factor should be classified as an “element” of, or an “exception” to, claim preclusion; we have clarified this question in the latter. Mr. Johnson, however, effectively rejects this clarification and suggests that the district court did not properly allocate the burden of proof—specifically, the burden of persuasion—between Cheyenne and the Estate with respect to the fair-and-full-opportunity-to-litigate factor.

It is beyond cavil that claim preclusion is an affirmative defense, as to which the burden of proof bears the burden of proof. But at least arguably in our precedential decisions, we have allocated to “the party seeking to avoid preclusion” the burden of proof as to the full-and-fair-opportunity-to-litigate exception. Be that as it may, we need not definitively opine on the burden-of-proof question because the district court, in fact, placed the burden of proof on the defendants. Insofar as Mr. Johnson suggests that the court’s observation that he “failed to establish the defendants’ proof demonstrates that the court actually placed the burden of proof on the defendants,” we disagree. Instead of treating the full-and-fair-opportunity factor as an exception to the burden of proof, the district court viewed it as one of “four” res judicata elements” that the defendants had the burden of showing.” The court, therefore, made its observation that Mr. Johnson had failed to establish the defendants’ proof in the context of its express statement that it had held the defendants to the burden of showing that Mr. Johnson had a full and fair opportunity to litigate his claims in the prior suits.” Accordingly, Mr. Johnson has no basis to object to the district court’s allocation of the burden of proof as to the full-and-fair-opportunity-to-litigate factor because the court allocated the burden as he desired.

In sum, we reject Mr. Johnson’s argument that Cheyenne and the Estate have failed to establish legally sufficient proof to establish claim preclusion as to the 1991 Action.

iii. Heck v. Humphrey Redux

Mr. Johnson also returns to an iteration of his Heck argument. He argues that, under Heck, he could not have brought the claims in his 2017 Action until he was exonerated in 2018. Thus, the district court erred in deeming those claims precluded by his earlier actions.

Mr. Johnson’s argument starts with Heck’s teaching that, to determine whether a conviction has prevented his § 1983 claim pertaining to that conviction from being litigated, “one must consider whether a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily render the conviction invalid.” “If it would, the complaint must be dismissed.” The plaintiff can demonstrate that the conviction or sentence has already been

Mr. Johnson adds to those principles from Heck our statement in Lenox MacLaren Surgical that “claim preclusion does not bar subsequent litigation of new claims based on facts the plaintiff did not and could not know when it filed its complaint.” Combining Heck and Lenox MacLaren Surgical, Mr. Johnson reasons that “since invalidation of his conviction was a non-existent fact at the time of his prior actions, he could not have brought his present claims in those prior actions.” He, in other words, argues that his claims did not begin accruing until he was exonerated.

But this argument runs into similar problems as those discussed above. Regardless of whether the district court in the 1991 Action should have held—even before Heck was decided—that Mr. Johnson’s claims were not cognizable under § 1983, the 1991 Action nonetheless adjudicated Mr. Johnson’s claims against Detective Stanford and Cheyenne. Following his appeal, the judgment in that case became final, and that final judgment will have claim-preclusive effect on the 2017 Action if the elements of preclusion are met. Because Mr. Johnson concedes that the district court correctly ruled that the second and third elements of claim preclusion are satisfied here, the 1991 Action will have claim-preclusive effect so long as it was “on the merits” and provided a “full and fair opportunity to litigate.” But Mr. Johnson does not argue that the district court erred in concluding that the 1991 Action was “on the merits,” and we have already rejected his argument that the action did not provide a “full and fair opportunity to litigate.” And so the judgment in the 1991 Action has precluded claims like those in the 2017 Action from the time it became final.

The Supreme Court’s later opinion in Heck did nothing to disturb the parties’ reliance on that final judgment: “once suit is barred by res judicata or by statutes of limitation or repose, a new rule cannot reopen the door already closed.”

We, thus, reject Mr. Johnson’s argument that the claims in the 2017 Action were not precluded by the 1991 Action because they were not cognizable under § 1983 until after he was exonerated.

In sum, we hold that the claims in the 2017 Action against Cheyenne and the Estate are precluded by the 1991 Action. We, thus, affirm the dismissal of those claims.

b. The 1992 Action is not entitled to claim-preclusive effect.

With respect to the 1992 Action, Mr. Johnson primarily disputes the first element of claim preclusion, i.e., whether there was “a final judgment on the merits.” We recount the relevant procedural history before agreeing with Mr. Johnson that the 1992 Action was not adjudicated “on the merits” and, therefore, did not have claim-preclusive effect on the 2017 Action. We, thus, reverse the district court’s dismissal of the claims against Officer Spencer—the only defendant in the 1992 Action—and remand for further proceedings on those claims. Because we conclude that the 1992 Action was not adjudicated “on the merits,” we need not entertain Mr. Johnson’s separate argument that the 1992 Action did not afford him a “full and fair opportunity to litigate.”

i. Relevant Procedural History

Mr. Johnson's 1992 Action was a § 1983 suit alleging that Officer Spencer violated his rights by providing false testimony about his eyeglasses at his criminal trial. The court dismissed the complaint sua sponte with prejudice as frivolous, (1) noting that in the process it had "concluded there were no facts justifying the plaintiff's claims that his constitutional rights were violated" and (2) holding that "the present complaint was simply an attempt by plaintiff to revisit the same claim that has previously been dismissed." The court reviewed the exhibits that Mr. Johnson had submitted with his complaint and concluded that they did not "establish even the slightest indication that Officer Spencer made false, or misleading, statements at the trial." The court, in conclusion, observed that Mr. Johnson had "failed to state an argument in his complaint" and, thus, held that his complaint was "frivolous and devoid of merit."

Further, the district court stated that "even assuming Mr. Johnson's constitutional rights were violated by Officer Spencer, it was harmless error." The court held in particular that "a reasonable possibility existed to believe the evidence of Mr. Johnson's eyeglasses contributed to his conviction" because there was other evidence—viz., the absence of identification of him, the presence of his driver's license and picture I.D. in her apartment, and the forensic evidence tying him to the seminal fluid preserved in the acquaintance assault kit—that had established Mr. Johnson's guilt. The court, thus, concluded that Officer Spencer's trial testimony about Mr. Johnson's eyeglasses "was, at best, extremely cumulative." The court then "dismissed the complaint with prejudice as frivolous" because Mr. Johnson had filed several related lawsuits, "all of which were frivolous and of questionable nature." The court subsequently underscored the basis for its action, after noting that "it had come to the attention of the court" that Mr. Johnson's in forma pauperis motion was pending. The court noted that it had recently determined that Mr. Johnson "had failed to state a rational argument on the facts or law in support of his claim and that the complaint was therefore frivolous and devoid of merit." "Therefore," the court denied Mr. Johnson's in forma pauperis motion.

On appeal from that judgment, we noted that the district court "dismissed the action as being 'frivolous'" and affirmed on the ground that "Mr. Johnson's lawsuit is based upon an otherwise meritless legal theory because a testifying police officer is entitled to absolute immunity."

ii. The "On the Merits" Requirement

As mentioned, a successful claim-preclusion defense requires "a final judgment on the merits in the earlier action." Mr. Johnson argues that the 1992 Action was not an adjudication on the merits" because the suit was dismissed as frivolous. We agree.

The Supreme Court settled this question in Denton v. Hernandez. There, the Court held that "the appropriate inquiry for determining when an in forma pauperis litigant's factual allegations justify a § 1915(d) dismissal for frivolousness." In doing so, the Court stated that "a § 1915(d) dismissal is not a dismissal on the merits, but rather an exercise of the court's discretion under the in forma pauperis statute, the dismissal does not prejudice the filer of the subsequent complaint making the same allegations."

In the 1992 Action, the district court expressly relied on the then-existing § 1915(d) in dismissing Mr. Johnson's claim as "frivolous and completely devoid of merit." And so, following Denton, we conclude that the district court's dismissal of the 1992 Action was not "on the merits."

Officer Spencer argues against this straightforward conclusion. He first contends that while it is "generally" true that a § 1915(d) dismissal is not "on the merits" when it is for factual frivolousness, the dismissal here should be deemed "on the merits" for claim-preclusion purposes because the district court additionally determined that Mr. Johnson's claims were not legally meritorious because any error was harmless. We reject this argument. The old § 1915(d) allowed district courts to dismiss a complaint as frivolous when it "lacked an arguable basis either in law or in fact." Although the Court in Denton emphasized that § 1915(d) provided courts with "the unusual power to pierce the veil of the complaint's factual allegations," thereby deviating from the Rule 12(b)(6) standard of largely "accepting without question the truth of the plaintiff's allegations," the Court ultimately drew no distinction between § 1915(d) dismissals for legal frivolity and those for factual frivolity when it stated that "a § 1915(d) dismissal is not a dismissal on the merits." While Denton itself specifically addressed a factually frivolous complaint, its rule that § 1915(d) dismissals are not on the merits contemplated § 1915(d) dismissals generally, i.e., dismissals based on both legal and factual frivolity.

Denton created a simple rule applying to all dismissals for frivolousness under the pre-1996 § 1915(d), regardless of whether the frivolousness was legal or factual, and we apply that rule here. The district court explicitly based its dismissal on § 1915(d). Although the court appended to the end of its order a one-paragraph discussion of the harmlessness of any purported error, that discussion did not transform the dismissal into a merits adjudication. Because the 1992 Action was not adjudicated on the merits, it has no preclusive effect on Mr. Johnson's paid complaint in the 2017 Action.

Officer Spencer also cites Bell v. Hood for the proposition that if a court "exercises its jurisdiction to determine that the allegations in the complaint do not state a ground for relief, then dismissal of the case would be on the merits, not for want of jurisdiction." But that general proposition in Bell does not address whether frivolousness determinations are on the merits, as the very next sentence makes clear. Therefore, we conclude that this proposition in Bell does nothing to limit the breadth of Denton's relevant pronouncement.

Relatedly, Officer Spencer relies on the Ninth Circuit's statement that "a dismissal for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6) is a 'judgment on the merits' to which res judicata applies." But that uncontroversial statement simply has no application here. The district court did not sua sponte dismiss the claim at issue here pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6); it expressly invoked § 1915(d). Stewart's discussion of Rule 12(b)(6) therefore has nothing to contribute to Denton's interpretation of § 1915(d).

Finally, the parties dispute whether an order with two holdings, one "on the merits" and one not, can have claim-preclusive effect. But we need not wade into this dispute. Notwithstanding the district court's discussion of harmlessness, its judgment in the 1992 Action was expressly and solely bottomed on a dismissal under § 1915(d). The court did not purport to rule on the merits, but instead dismissed under § 1915(d) on frivolousness grounds. And Dent question that such dismissals are not on the merits. This is not a case where the made two holdings—one on the merits and one not—and so the claim-preclusive e a circumstance are not before us.

In sum, because it was not an adjudication on the merits, we conclude that the cannot operate with claim-preclusive effect on the 2017 Action. We, thus, reverse court's order dismissing the 2017 Action's claims against Officer Spencer. Because w order based on the “on the merits” element of claim preclusion, we need not and d whether the district court's order was also erroneous because it determined that th provided Mr. Johnson with a “full and fair opportunity to litigate.”

III. CONCLUSION

We acknowledge the terrible reality that Mr. Johnson must have faced during the years that he was wrongly incarcerated. As the Supreme Court has stated, however, of claim preclusion “serves vital public interests beyond any individual ju determination of the equities in a particular case.” Thus, for the reasons we have the 2017 Action, we affirm the dismissal of the claims against the Estate and C reverse the dismissal of the claims against Officer Spencer and remand for further consistent with this opinion.

Hernandez v. Asset Acceptance, LLC, 970 F.Supp.2d 1194 (D. Colo. 2013)

MARCIAS. KRIEGER, Chief Judge.

Ms. Hernandez claims that the Defendant, a debt collection agency, violated the Fair Debt Collection Practice Act (FDCPA), when it failed to communicate to Experian, a credit reporting agency that she disputed a debt she had incurred. Ms. Hernandez allegedly incurred a debt with Xcel Energy and defaulted on the debt. The account was transferred to the Defendant for collection. In May 2011, Ms. Hernandez reviewed a copy of her Experian credit report and saw the Defendant's entry for the Xcel account on the report. On May 5, 2011, she called the Defendant to dispute the account. In June, August, October, and November 2011, the Defendant allegedly failed to communicate to Experian that Ms. Hernandez's Xcel Energy account was disputed. Ms. Hernandez asserts that this "Complaint and Jury Demand only seeks relief for activity that occurred after August 7, 2011." She seeks statutory damages available under the FDCPA, as well as attorney fees and costs.

By way of additional background, the Court notes that on July 1, 2011, Ms. Hernandez initiated Civil Action No. 11-cv-01729 (Hernandez I). In that case, Ms. Hernandez claimed that in June 2011, the Defendant violated the FDCPA by failing to report the Xcel Energy account as disputed between May 5, 2011 and July 1, 2011. She alleged violations of the FDCPA. A two-day jury trial was held on September 10, 2012. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the Defendant. Final judgment was entered in Hernandez I on September 21, 2012.

As relevant here, the Defendant moved to dismiss Ms. Hernandez's claims in this case under the doctrine of res judicata, also referred to as claim preclusion. The matter was referred to the Magistrate Judge, who recommends that the motion be granted. The Magistrate Judge found that Ms. Hernandez's claims must be dismissed because the claims asserted in this case arise from the same transaction, or series of transactions, as the claims asserted in Hernandez I.

Ms. Hernandez objects to the Magistrate Judge's factual conclusion that her claims arise out of the same transaction as those asserted in Hernandez I. Specifically, she alleges that here, she can rely on pleadings filed in Hernandez I to establish that the account, rather than rely on evidence of the May 5, 2011 phone call. She argues Hernandez I occurred after the conduct she alleged in that action, her claims in this independent facts.

"Under res judicata, or claim preclusion, a final judgment on the merits of an action bars the parties or their privies from relitigating issues that were or could have been litigated in a prior action." Claim preclusion requires a judgment on the merits in an earlier action, identity of the parties in the two suits, and identity of the cause of action in both suits. To determine whether the claims in two suits are identical, it must be determined whether the claims are out of the same transaction, or series of connected transactions. "A new action will lie only where it raises new and independent claims, not part of the previous transaction, based on the new facts."

Upon de novo review of the Recommendation, the Court reaches the same conclusion as articulated in the Recommendation for substantially the same reasons. Ms. Hernandez's view, her claims in this action are not independent simply because the conduct that occurred after Hernandez I. Even if she were to rely on pleadings in this case to establish that she disputed the account, the pleadings depend on the fact of the May 5, 2011 phone call to establish the dispute. The claims here relate to the same disputed conduct as in Hernandez I. Although they involve separate instances of the same course of conduct by the Defendant – the Defendant's failure to report the account as disputed after the May 5, 2011 phone call – although the Defendant's conduct in August, October, and November 2011 could have constituted additional violations of the FDCPA, those violations are not independent from the issue in Hernandez I.

Finally, the Court sees no reason why Ms. Hernandez could not have moved to amend her complaint in Hernandez I to include allegations of the conduct that occurred in August, October, and November 2011. The trial in Hernandez I occurred over a year after she filed her complaint in that case. Had she amended her complaint in Hernandez I, the jury could have been asked to determine whether the Defendant's additional communications with Experian constituted violations of the FDCPA. A plaintiff cannot "avoid supplementing his complaint with claims which are part of the same transaction asserted in the complaint, in the hope of bringing them up at a later date and time, arising out of the same transaction on some later occasion."

For the forgoing reasons, the Plaintiff's Objections are OVERRULED and the Recommendation is ADOPTED to the extent it recommends that the Plaintiff's claims be dismissed. The Motion to Dismiss is GRANTED and the Plaintiff's claims in this case are DISMISSED entirely, with prejudice. The Clerk of the Court shall close this case.

Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt, 136 S.Ct. 2292 (2016)

BREYER, J.

In Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 878 (1992), a plurality of the Court concluded that there “exists” an “undue burden” on a woman’s right to decide to have an abortion, and consequently a provision of law is constitutionally invalid, if the “purpose or effect” of the provision “is to place a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion before the fetus attains viability.” (Emphasis added.) The plurality added that “unnecessary health regulations that have the purpose or effect of presenting a substantial obstacle to a woman seeking an abortion impose an undue burden on the right.” Ibid.

We must here decide whether two provisions of Texas’ House Bill 2 violate the Federal Constitution as interpreted in Casey. The first provision, which we shall call the “admitting-privileges requirement,” says that a physician performing or inducing an abortion must, on the date the abortion is performed or induced, have active admitting privileges at a hospital that is located not further than 30 miles from the location at which the abortion is performed or induced.”

This provision amended Texas law that had previously required an abortion facility to maintain a written protocol “for managing medical emergencies and the transfer of patients requiring further emergency care to a hospital.”

The second provision, which we shall call the “surgical-center requirement,” says that the minimum standards for an abortion facility must be equivalent to the minimum standards adopted under the Texas Health and Safety Code section for ambulatory surgical centers.

We conclude that neither of these provisions confers medical benefits sufficient to justify the burdens upon access that each imposes. Each places a substantial obstacle in the path of women seeking a previability abortion, each constitutes an undue burden on abortion access, and each violates the Federal Constitution. Amdt. 14, § 1.

In July 2013, the Texas Legislature enacted House Bill 2 (H.B. 2 or Act). In September (before the new law took effect), a group of Texas abortion providers filed an action in Federal District Court seeking facial invalidation of the law’s admitting-privileges provision. In late October, the District Court granted the injunction. But three days later, the Fifth Circuit vacated the injunction, thereby permitting the provision to take effect.

The Fifth Circuit subsequently upheld the provision, and set forth its reasons in a decision released late the following March. In that opinion, the Fifth Circuit pointed to evidence introduced in the District Court the previous October. It noted that Texas had offered evidence designed to show that the admitting-privileges requirement “will reduce the delay in treatment and decrease health risk for abortion patients with critical complications,” and that it “screen out” untrained or incompetent abortion providers.” The opinion also explained that plaintiffs had not provided sufficient evidence “that abortion practitioners will likely be compelled to comply with the privileges requirement.” The court said that all “of the major metropolitan areas in Texas, including Austin, Corpus Christi, Dallas, El Paso, Houston, and San Antonio,” would have multiple clinics where many physicians will have or obtain hospital admitting privileges. The Abbott plaintiffs did not file a petition for certiorari in this Court.

On April 6, one week after the Fifth Circuit’s decision, petitioners, a group of abortion facilities (many of whom were plaintiffs in the previous lawsuit), filed the present lawsuit in the United States District Court. They sought an injunction preventing enforcement of the admitting-privileges provision as applied to physicians at two abortion facilities, one operated by Whole Woman’s Health in McAllen and the other operated by Nova Health Systems in El Paso. The petitioners sought an injunction prohibiting enforcement of the surgical-center provision anywhere in Texas. They claimed that the admitting-privileges provision and the surgical-center provision violated the Constitution’s Fourteenth Amendment, as interpreted in Casey.

The District Court subsequently received stipulations from the parties and deposition testimony from the parties’ experts. The court conducted a 4-day bench trial. It heard, among other things, expert witness opinions from expert witnesses for both sides. On the basis of the stipulations, deposition testimony, and bench trial testimony, that court reached the following conclusions:

1. Of Texas’ population of more than 25 million people, “approximately 5.4 million” are women of “reproductive age,” living within a geographical area of “nearly 280,000 square miles.”
2. “In recent years, the number of abortions reported in Texas has stayed fairly constant, fluctuating between approximately 15-16% of the reported pregnancy rate, for a total number of about 60,000-72,000 legal abortions performed annually.”
3. Prior to the enactment of H.B. 2, there were more than 40 licensed abortion facilities in Texas, which “number dropped by almost half leading up to and in the wake of enforcement of the admitting-privileges requirement that went into effect in late-October 2013.”
4. If the surgical-center provision were allowed to take effect, the number of abortion facilities in Texas, after September 1, 2014, would be reduced further, so that “only seven facilities are likely to remain in operation, and the eighth will exist in Texas.”
5. Abortion facilities “will remain only in Houston, Austin, San Antonio, and the surrounding DFW [Dallas-Fort Worth] metropolitan region.” These include “one facility in Austin, two in Dallas-Fort Worth, two in Houston, and either one or two in San Antonio.”

6. "Based on historical data pertaining to Texas's average number of abortions, and assuming perfectly equal distribution among the remaining seven or eight providers, this would result in each facility serving between 7,500 and 10,000 patients per year. Accounting for the seasonal variations in pregnancy rates and a slightly unequal distribution of patients at each clinic, it is foreseeable that over 1,200 women per month could be vying for counseling, appointments, and follow-up visits at some of these facilities."
7. The suggestion "that these seven or eight providers could meet the demand of the entire state stretches credulity."
8. "Between November 1, 2012 and May 1, 2014," that is, before and after enforcement of the admitting-privileges requirement, "the decrease in geographical distribution of abortion facilities" has meant that the number of women of reproductive age living more than 50 miles from a clinic has doubled (from 800,000 to over 1.6 million); those living more than 100 miles has increased by 150% (from 400,000 to 1 million); those living more than 150 miles has increased by more than 350% (from 86,000 to 400,000); and those living more than 200 miles has increased by about 2,800% (from 10,000 to 290,000). After September 2014, should the surgical-center requirement go into effect, the number of women of reproductive age living significant distances from an abortion provider will increase as follows: 2 million women of reproductive age will live more than 50 miles from an abortion provider; 1.3 million will live more than 100 miles from an abortion provider; 900,000 will live more than 150 miles from an abortion provider; and 750,000 more than 200 miles from an abortion provider.
9. The "two requirements erect a particularly high barrier for poor, rural, or disadvantaged women."
10. "The great weight of evidence demonstrates that, before the act's passage, abortion in Texas was extremely safe with particularly low rates of serious complications and virtually no deaths occurring on account of the procedure."
11. "Abortion, as regulated by the State before the enactment of House Bill 2, has been shown to be much safer, in terms of minor and serious complications, than many common medical procedures not subject to such intense regulation and scrutiny."
12. "Additionally, risks are not appreciably lowered for patients who undergo abortions at ambulatory surgical centers as compared to nonsurgical-center facilities."
13. "Women will not obtain better care or experience more frequent positive outcomes at an ambulatory surgical center as compared to a previously licensed facility."
14. "There are 433 licensed ambulatory surgical centers in Texas," of which "336 are apparently either 'grandfathered' or enjoy the benefit of a waiver of some or all" of the surgical-center "requirements."

15. The “cost of coming into compliance” with the surgical-center requirement clinics is significant,” “undisputedly approaching 1 million dollars,” and “most likely 1.5 million dollars,” with “some clinics” unable to “comply due to physical size limitations.” The “cost of acquiring land and constructing a new compliant clinic will be three million dollars.”

On the basis of these and other related findings, the District Court determined that the surgical-center requirement “imposes an undue burden on the right of women throughout a previability abortion,” and that the “admitting-privileges requirement, in conjunction with the ambulatory-surgical-center requirement, imposes an undue burden on the right of women to have an abortion in the Rio Grande Valley, El Paso, and West Texas to seek a previability abortion.” The Court concluded that the “two provisions” would cause “the closing of almost all abortion clinics in Texas that were operating legally in the fall of 2013,” and thereby create a constitutional “impermissible obstacle as applied to all women seeking a previability abortion” by preventing women from having access to previously available legal facilities.” On August 29, 2014, the court enjoined enforcement of the two provisions.

On October 2, 2014, at Texas’ request, the Court of Appeals stayed the District Court’s injunction. Within the next two weeks, this Court vacated the Court of Appeals’ stay (in substance) thereby leaving in effect the District Court’s injunction against enforcement of the surgical-center provision and its injunction against enforcement of the admitting-privileges requirement as applied to the McAllen and El Paso clinics. The Court of Appeals then heard Texas’ appeal.

On June 9, 2015, the Court of Appeals reversed the District Court on the merits of both provisions. In doing so, it found both provisions constitutional and allowed them to take effect. The Court of Appeals’ decision rests upon alternative grounds and fact-related considerations, but sets forth its basic reasoning in some detail. The Court of Appeals concluded:

- The District Court was wrong to hold the admitting-privileges requirement unconstitutional because (except for the clinics in McAllen and El Paso) the providers had not asked for a injunction, and principles of res judicata barred relief.
- Because the providers could have brought their constitutional challenge to the surgical-center provision in their earlier lawsuit, principles of res judicata also barred that claim.
- In any event, a state law “regulating previability abortion is constitutional if: (1) it does not have the purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion of a nonviable fetus; and (2) it is reasonably related to (or designed to serve) a legitimate state interest.”
- “Both the admitting privileges requirement and” the surgical-center requirement are “rationally related to a legitimate state interest,” namely, “raising the standard of care for women seeking abortions and protecting the health and welfare of women seeking abortions.”

- The “plaintiffs” failed “to proffer competent evidence contradicting the legislature’s statement of a legitimate purpose.”
- “The district court erred by substituting its own judgment as to the provisions’ effects for that of the legislature, albeit in the name of the undue burden inquiry.”
- Holding the provisions unconstitutional on their face is improper because the plaintiffs had failed to show that either of the provisions “imposes an undue burden on a large fraction of women.”
- The District Court erred in finding that, if the surgical-center requirement takes effect, there will be too few abortion providers in Texas to meet the demand. That factual determination was based upon the finding of one of plaintiffs’ expert witnesses (Dr. Grossman) that abortion providers in Texas “will not be able to go from providing approximately 14,000 abortions annually, as they currently are, to providing the 60,000 to 70,000 abortions that are done each year in Texas once all” of the clinics failing to meet the surgical-center requirement “are forced to close.” But Dr. Grossman’s opinion is (in the Court of Appeals’ view) “ipse dixit”; the “record lacks any actual evidence regarding the current or future capacity of the eight clinics”; and there is no “evidence in the record that” the providers that currently meet the surgical-center requirement “are operating at full capacity or that they cannot increase capacity.”

For these and related reasons, the Court of Appeals reversed the District Court’s holding that the admitting-privileges requirement is unconstitutional and its holding that the surgical-center requirement is unconstitutional. The Court of Appeals upheld in part the District Court’s more specific holding that the requirements are unconstitutional as applied to the McAllen facility and Dr. Lynn (a doctor at that facility), but it reversed the District Court’s holding that the surgical-center requirement is unconstitutional as applied to the facility in El Paso. In respect to this last claim, the Court of Appeals said that women in El Paso wishing to have an abortion could use abortion providers in nearby New Mexico.

II

Before turning to the constitutional question, we must consider the Court of Appeals’ procedural grounds for holding that (but for the challenge to the provisions of H.B. 2 as applied to McAllen and El Paso) petitioners were barred from bringing their constitutional challenges.

Claim Preclusion—Admitting-Privileges Requirement

We hold that res judicata neither bars petitioners’ challenges to the admitting-privileges requirement nor prevents us from awarding facial relief.

For one thing, to the extent that the Court of Appeals concluded that the principle of res judicata bars any facial challenge to the admitting-privileges requirement, the court may have precluded petitioners' claims. Petitioners did not bring a facial challenge to the admitting-privileges requirement in this case but instead challenged that requirement as applied to women in McAllen and El Paso. The question is whether res judicata bars petitioners' particular as-applied challenges. On this point, the Court of Appeals concluded that res judicata was no bar, and we agree.

The doctrine of claim preclusion (the here-relevant aspect of res judicata) prohibits “the relitigation of the very same claim” by the same parties. Petitioners’ post-enforcement facial challenge is not “the very same claim” as their preenforcement facial challenge. The Restatement of Judgments notes that development of new material facts can mean that a case and an otherwise similar previous case do not present the same claim. The Court of Appeals have used similar rules to determine the contours of a new claim for purposes of preclusion. The Restatement adds that, where “important human values—such as the lawfulness of continuing personal disability or restraint—are at stake, even a slight change in circumstances may afford a sufficient basis for concluding that a second action may be maintainable.”

We find this approach persuasive. Imagine a group of prisoners who claim that they were forced to drink contaminated water. These prisoners file suit against the facility where they are incarcerated. If at first their suit is dismissed because a court does not believe that the water would be severe enough to be unconstitutional, it would make no sense to prevent the prisoners from bringing a later suit if time and experience eventually showed that they were dying from contaminated water. Such circumstances would give rise to a new claim: the prisoners’ treatment violates the Constitution. Factual developments may establish constitutional harm, which seemed too remote or speculative to afford relief at the time of the earlier suit, was in fact indisputable. In our view, such changed circumstances will support a new constitutional claim. This approach is sensible, and it is consistent with our principles of justice.

Changed circumstances of this kind are why the claim presented in Abbott is not the same as petitioners’ claim here. The claims in both Abbott and the present case involve “important human values.” We are concerned with H.B. 2’s “effect on women seeking abortion.” The effect has changed dramatically since petitioners filed their first lawsuit. Abbott relied heavily on the record and evidence presented to the District Court in October 2013. Petitioners’ claim in this case rests in significant part upon later, concrete factual developments. Those developments are reflected in the record of the Court of Appeals proceedings. Abbott plaintiffs brought their facial challenge to the admitting-privileges requirement before its enforcement—before many abortion clinics had closed and while it was still possible that many clinics would be affected. Here, petitioners bring an as-applied challenge to the admitting-privileges requirement after its enforcement—and after a large number of clinics have in fact closed. The post-enforcement consequences of H.B. 2 were unknowable before it went into effect, but the court itself recognized that “later as-applied challenges can always deal with concrete constitutional issues.” And the Court of Appeals in this case properly decided that the evidence presented by petitioners had given rise to a new claim and that petitioners’ as-applied challenges are not precluded.

When individuals claim that a particular statute will produce serious constitutionally relevant adverse consequences before they have occurred—and when the courts doubt their likely occurrence—the factual difference that those adverse consequences have in fact occurred can make all the difference. Compare the Fifth Circuit’s opinion in the earlier case, Abbott, (“All of the major Texas cities continue to have multiple clinics where many physicians will have or obtain hospital admitting privileges”), with the facts found in this case, (the two provisions will leave Texas with seven or eight clinics). The challenge brought in this case and the one in Abbott are not the “very same claim,” and the doctrine of claim preclusion consequently does not bar a new challenge to the constitutionality of the admitting-privileges requirement. That the litigants in Abbott did not seek review in this Court, as the dissent suggests they should have done, does not prevent them from seeking review of new claims that have arisen after Abbott was decided. In sum, the Restatement, cases from the Courts of Appeals, our own precedent, and simple logic combine to convince us that res judicata does not bar this claim.

The Court of Appeals also concluded that the award of facial relief was precluded by principles of res judicata. The court concluded that the District Court should not have “granted more relief than anyone requested or briefed.” But in addition to asking for as-applied relief, petitioners asked for “such other and further relief as the Court may deem just, proper, and equitable.” Their evidence and arguments convinced the District Court that the provision was unconstitutional across the board. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure state that (with an exception not relevant here) a “final judgment should grant the relief to which each party is entitled, even if the party has not demanded that relief in its pleadings.” Rule 54(c). And we have held that, if the arguments and evidence show that a statutory provision is unconstitutional on its face, an injunction prohibiting its enforcement is “proper.” Nothing prevents this Court from awarding facial relief as the appropriate remedy for petitioners’ as-applied claims.

Claim Preclusion—Surgical-Center Requirement

The Court of Appeals also held that claim preclusion barred petitioners from contending that the surgical-center requirement is unconstitutional. Although it recognized that petitioners did not bring this claim in Abbott, it believed that they should have done so. The court explained that petitioners’ constitutional challenge to the surgical-center requirement and the challenge to the admitting-privileges requirement mounted in Abbott arise from the same ‘transaction or series of connected transactions.’ The challenges involve the same parties and abortion facilities; the challenges are governed by the same legal standards; the provisions at issue were enacted at the same time as part of the same act; the provisions were motivated by a common purpose; the provisions are administered by the same state officials; and the challenges form a convenient trial unit because they rely on a common nucleus of operative facts.”

For all these reasons, the Court of Appeals held petitioners’ challenge to H.B. 2’s surgical-center requirement was precluded.

The Court of Appeals failed, however, to take account of meaningful differences. center provision and the admitting-privileges provision are separate, distinct provisions. They set forth two different, independent requirements with different enforcement mechanisms. The Court has never suggested that challenges to two different statutory provisions that serve different functions must be brought in a single suit. And lower courts normally treat challenges to distinct regulatory requirements as “separate claims,” even when they are part of an overarching “government regulatory scheme.”

That approach makes sense. The opposite approach adopted by the Court of Appeals would require treating every statutory enactment as a single transaction which a given party could only be able to challenge one time, in one lawsuit, in order to avoid the effects of preclusion. Such a rule would encourage a kitchen-sink approach to any litigation challenging the validity of statutes. That outcome is less than optimal—not only for litigants, but for the public.

There are other good reasons why petitioners should not have had to bring their challenges to the surgical-center provision at the same time they brought their first suit. The state gave the Texas Department of State Health Services authority to make rules implementing the surgical-center requirement. At the time petitioners filed Abbott, that state agency had not yet issued such rules.

Further, petitioners might well have expected that those rules when issued would grandfather some then-existing abortion facilities and granting facility-wide waivers to others. After all, more than three quarters of non-abortion-related surgical centers had benefited from that kind of provision.

Finally, the relevant factual circumstances changed between Abbott and the present case, as we previously described.

For all of these reasons, we hold that the petitioners did not have to bring their challenge to the surgical-center provision when they challenged the admitting-privileges provision. We accordingly hold that the doctrine of claim preclusion does not prevent them from challenging the surgical-center provision now.

2.3 Same Parties

Taylor v. Sturgell, 553 U.S. 880 (2008)

Justice GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court.

“It is a principle of general application in Anglo-American jurisprudence that one cannot be bound by a judgment in personam in a litigation in which he is not designated as a party or who has not been made a party by service of process.” Several exceptions, recognized in many decisions, temper this basic rule. In a class action, for example, a person not named as a party may be bound by a judgment on the merits of the action, if she was adequately represented.

a party who actively participated in the litigation. In this case, we consider for the first time whether there is a “virtual representation” exception to the general rule against precluding nonparties. Adopted by a number of courts, including the courts below in the case now before us, the exception so styled is broader than any we have so far approved.

The virtual representation question we examine in this opinion arises in the following context. Petitioner Brent Taylor filed a lawsuit under the Freedom of Information Act seeking certain documents from the Federal Aviation Administration. Greg Herrick, Taylor’s friend, had previously brought an unsuccessful suit seeking the same records. The two men have no legal relationship, and there is no evidence that Taylor controlled, financed, participated in, or even had notice of Herrick’s earlier suit. Nevertheless, the D.C. Circuit held Taylor’s suit precluded by the judgment against Herrick because, in that court’s assessment, Herrick qualified as Taylor’s “virtual representative.”

We disapprove the doctrine of preclusion by “virtual representation,” and hold, based on the record as it now stands, that the judgment against Herrick does not bar Taylor from maintaining this suit.

The Freedom of Information Act (FOIA or Act) accords “any person” a right to request any records held by a federal agency. No reason need be given for a FOIA request, and unless the requested materials fall within one of the Act’s enumerated exemptions, the agency must “make the records promptly available” to the requester. If an agency refuses to furnish the requested records, the requester may file suit in federal court and obtain an injunction “ordering the production of any agency records improperly withheld.”

The courts below held the instant FOIA suit barred by the judgment in earlier litigation seeking the same records. Because the lower courts’ decisions turned on the connection between the two lawsuits, we begin with a full account of each action.

The first suit was filed by Greg Herrick, an antique aircraft enthusiast and the owner of an F-45 airplane, a vintage model manufactured by the Fairchild Engine and Airplane Corporation (FEAC) in the 1930’s. In 1997, seeking information that would help him restore his plane to its original condition, Herrick filed a FOIA request asking the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) for copies of any technical documents about the F-45 contained in the agency’s records.

To gain a certificate authorizing the manufacture and sale of the F-45, FEAC had submitted to the FAA’s predecessor, the Civil Aeronautics Authority, detailed specifications and other technical data about the plane. Hundreds of pages of documents produced by FEAC in the certification process remain in the FAA’s records. The FAA denied Herrick’s request, however, upon finding that the documents he sought are subject to FOIA’s exemption for “trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential”. In an administrative appeal, Herrick urged that FEAC and its successors had waived any protection. The FAA thereupon contacted FEAC's corporate successor, respondent Corporation (Fairchild). Because Fairchild objected to release of the documents, it adhered to its original decision.

Herrick then filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Wyoming. Challenging the FAA's invocation of the trade-secret exemption, Herrick placed heavy weight on a 1955 letter from FEAC to the Civil Aeronautics Authority. The letter authorized the agency to lend any records held in its files to the public "for use in making repairs or replacement parts for aircraft by Fairchild." This broad authorization, Herrick maintained, showed that the F-45 certification records held by the FAA could not be regarded as "secret" or "confidential" within the meaning of § 552(b)(4).

Rejecting Herrick's argument, the District Court granted summary judgment to the FAA. The court reasoned that the 1955 letter, which did not deprive the F-45 certification documents of trade-secret status, did not deprive the F-45 certification documents of trade-secret status, for those documents were never in fact released pursuant to the letter's authorization. The court also stated that even if the 1955 letter had waived trade-secret protection, Fairchild had successfully "reversed" the waiver by objecting to the FAA's entry of the records to Herrick.

On appeal, the Tenth Circuit agreed with Herrick that the 1955 letter had stripped the F-45 certification documents of trade-secret protection. But the Court of Appeals upheld the District Court's alternative determination —i.e., that Fairchild had restored trade-secret status by objecting to the FAA's entry of the records to Herrick. On that ground, the appeals court affirmed the entry of summary judgment for the FAA.

In so ruling, the Tenth Circuit noted that Herrick had failed to challenge two assumptions underlying the District Court's decision. First, the District Court assumed that the 1955 letter could be "restored" to documents that had lost protection. Second, the District Court assumed that Fairchild had regained trade-secret status for the documents even though the company claimed that status only "after Herrick had initiated his request" for the records. The Court of Appeals expressed no opinion on the validity of these suppositions.

The Tenth Circuit's decision issued on July 24, 2002. Less than a month later, another petitioner Brent Taylor—a friend of Herrick's and an antique aircraft enthusiast—submitted a FOIA request seeking the same documents Herrick had unsuccessfully sought to obtain. When the FAA failed to respond, Taylor filed a complaint in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Like Herrick, Taylor argued that FEAC's 1955 letter had stripped the F-45 certification records of their trade-secret status. But Taylor also sought to litigate the two issues of recapture of protected status that Herrick had failed to raise in his appeal to the Tenth Circuit.

After Fairchild intervened as a defendant, the District Court in D.C. concluded that Taylor's claim was barred by claim preclusion; accordingly, it granted summary judgment to Fairchild and the FAA. The court acknowledged that Taylor was not a party to Herrick's suit. However, a nonparty may be bound by a judgment if she was "virtually represented" by a party to the

The record before the District Court in Taylor’s suit revealed the following facts about the relationship between Taylor and Herrick: Taylor is the president of the Antique Aircraft Association, an organization to which Herrick belongs; the two men are “close associates”; Herrick asked Taylor to help restore Herrick’s F-45, though they had no contract or agreement for Taylor’s participation in the restoration; Taylor was represented by the lawyer who represented Herrick in the earlier litigation; and Herrick apparently gave Taylor documents that Herrick had obtained from the FAA during discovery in his suit.

Fairchild and the FAA conceded that Taylor had not participated in Herrick’s suit. The D.C. District Court determined, however, that Herrick ranked as Taylor’s virtual representative. Accordingly, the District Court held Taylor’s suit, seeking the same documents Herrick had requested, barred by the judgment against Herrick.

The D.C. Circuit affirmed.

We granted certiorari, to resolve the disagreement among the Circuits over the permissibility and scope of preclusion based on “virtual representation.”

II

The preclusive effect of a federal-court judgment is determined by federal common law. For judgments in federal-question cases—for example, Herrick’s FOIA suit—federal courts participate in developing “uniform federal rules” of res judicata, which this Court has ultimate authority to determine and declare. The federal common law of preclusion is, of course, subject to due process limitations.

Taylor’s case presents an issue of first impression in this sense: Until now, we have never addressed the doctrine of “virtual representation” adopted (in varying forms) by several Circuits and relied upon by the courts below. Our inquiry, however, is guided by well-established precedent regarding the propriety of nonparty preclusion. We review that precedent before taking up directly the issue of virtual representation.

The preclusive effect of a judgment is defined by claim preclusion and issue preclusion, which are collectively referred to as “res judicata.” Under the doctrine of claim preclusion, a final judgment forecloses “successive litigation of the very same claim, whether or not relitigation of the claim raises the same issues as the earlier suit.” Issue preclusion, in contrast, bars “successive litigation of an issue of fact or law actually litigated and resolved in a valid court determination essential to the prior judgment,” even if the issue recurs in the context of a different claim. By “precluding parties from contesting matters that they have had a full and fair opportunity to litigate,” these two doctrines protect against “the expense and vexation attending multiple lawsuits, conserve judicial resources, and foster reliance on judicial action by minimizing the possibility of inconsistent decisions.”

A person who was not a party to a suit generally has not had a “full and fair opportunity to litigate” the claims and issues settled in that suit. The application of claim and issue preclusion to nonparties thus runs up against the “deep-rooted historic tradition that every man should have his own day in court.” Indicating the strength of that tradition, we have often followed the general rule that “one is not bound by a judgment in personam in a litigation in which he is not designated as a party or to which he has not been made a party by service of process.”²⁷

Though hardly in doubt, the rule against nonparty preclusion is subject to exception. For present purposes, the recognized exceptions can be grouped into six categories.

First, “a person who agrees to be bound by the determination of issues in an action to which others are bound in accordance with the terms of his agreement.”¹ Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 40, p.390 (1980) (hereinafter Restatement). For example, “if separate actions involving the same transaction are brought by different plaintiffs against the same defendant, all the parties to all the actions may agree that the question of the defendant’s liability will be definitely determined, one way or the other, in a ‘test case.’”

Second, nonparty preclusion may be justified based on a variety of pre-existing “substantive legal relationships” between the person to be bound and a party to the judgment. These relationships include, but are not limited to, preceding and succeeding owners of property, lessor and bailor, and assignee and assignor. These exceptions originated “as much from substantive property law as from the values of preclusion by judgment.”²⁷

Third, we have confirmed that, “in certain limited circumstances,” a nonparty may be bound by a judgment because she was “adequately represented by someone with the same right as who was a party” to the suit. Representative suits with preclusive effect on nonparties include properly conducted class actions, and suits brought by trustees, guardians, and other fiduciaries.

Fourth, a nonparty is bound by a judgment if she “assumed control” over the litigation before that judgment was rendered. Because such a person has had “the opportunity to participate in the trial and argument,” he has already “had his day in court” even though he was not a formal party to the litigation.

Fifth, a party bound by a judgment may not avoid its preclusive force by relitigating the issue through a proxy. Preclusion is thus in order when a person who did not participate in a litigation brings suit as the designated representative of a person who was a party to the prior litigation. And although our decisions have not addressed the issue directly, it also seems appropriate that preclusion is appropriate when a nonparty later brings suit as an agent for a party who was bound by a judgment.

Sixth, in certain circumstances a special statutory scheme may “expressly foreclose a nonlitigant from bringing a cause of action . . . if the scheme is otherwise consistent with due process.” Such schemes include bankruptcy and probate proceedings, and quo warranto actions. In such cases, suits that, “under the governing law, may be brought only on behalf of the public at large.”

²⁷(n.8 in opinion) The substantive legal relationships justifying preclusion are sometimes collectively referred to as “privity.” The term “privity,” however, has also come to be used more broadly, as a way to express the conclusion that nonparty preclusion is appropriate on any ground. To ward off confusion, we avoid using the term “privity” in this opinion.

“Quo warranto is Latin for ‘by what warrant’ (or authority). A writ of quo warranto is a common law remedy which is used to challenge a person’s right to hold a public or corporate office. A state may also use a quo warranto action to revoke a corporation’s charter. When bringing a petition for writ of quo warranto, individual members of the public have standing as citizens and taxpayers.” Wex Legal Dictionary

Reaching beyond these six established categories, some lower courts have recognized a “virtual representation” exception to the rule against nonparty preclusion. Decisions of these courts, however, have been far from consistent. Some Circuits use the label, but define “virtual representation” so that it is no broader than the recognized exception for adequate representation. But other courts, including the Eighth, Ninth, and D.C. Circuits, apply multifactor tests for virtual representation that permit nonparty preclusion in cases that do not fit within any of the established exceptions.

The D.C. Circuit, the FAA, and Fairchild have presented three arguments in support of an expansive doctrine of virtual representation. We find none of them persuasive.

Fairchild and the FAA do not argue that the D.C. Circuit’s virtual representation doctrine fits within any of the recognized grounds for nonparty preclusion. Rather, they ask us to abandon the attempt to delineate discrete grounds and clear rules altogether. Preclusion is in order, they contend, whenever “the relationship between a party and a non-party is ‘close enough’ to bring the second litigant within the judgment.” Courts should make the “close enough” determination, they urge, through a “heavily fact-driven” and “equitable” inquiry. Only this sort of diffuse balancing, Fairchild and the FAA argue, can account for all of the situations in which nonparty preclusion is appropriate.

We reject this argument for three reasons. First, our decisions emphasize the fundamental nature of the general rule that a litigant is not bound by a judgment to which she was not a party. Accordingly, we have endeavored to delineate discrete exceptions that apply in “limited circumstances.” Respondents’ amorphous balancing test is at odds with the constrained approach to nonparty preclusion our decisions advance.

Our second reason for rejecting a broad doctrine of virtual representation rests on the limitations attending nonparty preclusion based on adequate representation. A party’s representation of a nonparty is “adequate” for preclusion purposes only if, at a minimum: (1) The interests of the nonparty and her representative are aligned; and (2) either the party understood herself to be acting in a representative capacity or the original court took care to protect the interests of the nonparty. In addition, adequate representation sometimes requires (3) notice of the original suit to the persons alleged to have been represented. In the class-action context, these limitations are implemented by the procedural safeguards contained in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23.

An expansive doctrine of virtual representation, however, would “recognize, in effect, a common-law kind of class action.” That is, virtual representation would authorize preclusion based on identity of interests and some kind of relationship between parties and nonparties, shorn of the procedural protections prescribed in Hansberry, Richards, and Rule 23. These protections, grounded in due process, could be circumvented were we to approve a virtual representation doctrine that allowed courts to “create de facto class actions at will.”

Third, a diffuse balancing approach to nonparty preclusion would likely create more problems than it relieves. Most obviously, it could significantly complicate the task of district judges in the first instance with preclusion questions. An all-things-considered balancing approach might spark wide-ranging, time-consuming, and expensive discovery tranches of documents potentially relevant under seven- or five-prong tests. And after the relevant facts are known, district judges would be called upon to evaluate them under a standard that provides little guidance. Preclusion doctrine, it should be recalled, is intended to reduce the burden of proof on courts and parties. “In this area of the law,” we agree, “crisp rules with sharp boundaries are preferable to a round-about doctrine of opaque standards.”

Finally, the FAA maintains that nonparty preclusion should apply more broadly in “public law” litigation than in “private law” controversies. To support this position, the FAA offers two arguments. First, the FAA urges, our decision in Richards acknowledges that, in certain circumstances, the plaintiff has a reduced interest in controlling the litigation “because of the public nature of the right at issue.” When a taxpayer challenges “an alleged misuse of public funds in the course of a public action,” we observed in Richards, the suit “has only an indirect impact on the plaintiff’s interests.” In actions of this character, the Court said, “we may assume that the State has the latitude to establish procedures . . . to limit the number of judicial proceedings that may be entertained.”

Taylor’s FOIA action falls within the category described in Richards, the FAA contends. We held that “the duty to disclose under FOIA is owed to the public generally.” The opening sentence of the FOIA, it is true, states that agencies “shall make information available to the public.” But, as we have several times said that FOIA vindicates a “public” interest. The Act, however, contemplates that agencies receiving FOIA requests to make the information available not to the public at large, but rather to the “person” making the request. Thus, in contrast to the public-law litigation contemplated in Richards, a successful FOIA action results in a grant of relief to the plaintiff, not a decree benefiting the public at large.

Furthermore, we said in Richards only that, for the type of public-law claims there, the States are free to adopt procedures limiting repetitive litigation. In this regard, we cited instances in which the first judgment foreclosed successive litigation by other means, because, “under state law, the suit could be brought only on behalf of the public at large.” We spoke of state legislation, but it appears equally evident that Congress, in providing for FOIA, in vindicating a public interest, may “limit the number of judicial proceedings that may be entertained.” It hardly follows, however, that this Court should proscribe or confirm such constraint on successive actions counseled against judicial imposition of constraints on the extraordinary application of the common law of preclusion.

The FAA next argues that “the threat of vexatious litigation is heightened” in public-law cases because “the number of plaintiffs with standing is potentially limitless.” FOIA does allow “any person” whose request is denied to resort to federal court for review of the agency’s determination. Thus it is theoretically possible that several persons could coordinate to mount a series of repetitive lawsuits.

But we are not convinced that this risk justifies departure from the usual rules governing nonparty preclusion. First, stare decisis will allow courts swiftly to dispose of repetitive suits brought in the same circuit. Second, even when stare decisis is not dispositive, “the human tendency not to waste money will deter the bringing of suits based on claims or issues that have already been adversely determined against others.” This intuition seems to be borne out by experience: The FAA has not called our attention to any instances of abusive FOIA suits in the Circuits that reject the virtual representation theory respondents advocate here.

IV

For the foregoing reasons, we disapprove the theory of virtual representation on which the decision below rested. The preclusive effects of a judgment in a federal-question case decided by a federal court should instead be determined according to the established grounds for nonparty preclusion described in this opinion.

Although references to “virtual representation” have proliferated in the lower courts, our decision is unlikely to occasion any great shift in actual practice. Many opinions use the term “virtual representation” in reaching results at least arguably defensible on established grounds. In these cases, dropping the “virtual representation” label would lead to clearer analysis with little, if any, change in outcomes.

In some cases, however, lower courts have relied on virtual representation to extend nonparty preclusion beyond the latter doctrine’s proper bounds. We now turn back to Taylor’s action to determine whether his suit is such a case, or whether the result reached by the courts below can be justified on one of the recognized grounds for nonparty preclusion.

It is uncontested that four of the six grounds for nonparty preclusion have no application here: There is no indication that Taylor agreed to be bound by Herrick’s litigation, that Taylor and Herrick have any legal relationship, that Taylor exercised any control over Herrick’s suit, or that this suit implicates any special statutory scheme limiting relitigation. Neither the FAA nor Fairchild contends otherwise.

It is equally clear that preclusion cannot be justified on the theory that Taylor was adequately represented in Herrick’s suit. Nothing in the record indicates that Herrick understood himself to be suing on Taylor’s behalf, that Taylor even knew of Herrick’s suit, or that the Wyoming District Court took special care to protect Taylor’s interests. Under our pathmarking precedent, therefore, Herrick’s representation was not “adequate.”

That leaves only the fifth category: preclusion because a nonparty to an earlier case brought suit as a representative or agent of a party who is bound by the prior adjudication. Herrick is not Herrick's legal representative and he has not purported to sue in a representative capacity. He concedes, however, that preclusion would be appropriate if respondents could establish that he is acting as Herrick's "undisclosed agent."

Respondents argue here, as they did below, that Taylor's suit is a collusive attempt to circumvent Herrick's action. The D.C. Circuit considered a similar question in addressing the "wholly maneuvering" prong of its virtual representation test. The Court of Appeals did not purport to treat the issue as one of agency, and it expressly declined to reach any definitive conclusion as to "the ambiguity of the facts." We therefore remand to give the courts below an opportunity to determine whether Taylor, in pursuing the instant FOIA suit, is acting as Herrick's agent. Herrick concedes that such a remand is appropriate.

We have never defined the showing required to establish that a nonparty to a prior case has become a litigating agent for a party to the earlier case. Because the issue has not been briefed in any detail, we do not discuss the matter elaboratively here. We note, however, that lower courts should be cautious about finding preclusion on this basis. A mere whisper of "wholly maneuvering" will not suffice; instead, principles of agency law are suggestive. The D.C. Circuit held that preclusion is appropriate only if the putative agent's conduct of the suit is such that it is clear that the agent is under the control of the party who is bound by the prior adjudication.

On remand, Fairchild suggests, Taylor should bear the burden of proving he is acting as Herrick's agent. When a defendant points to evidence establishing a close relationship between successive litigants, Fairchild maintains, "the burden should shift to the second plaintiff to submit evidence refuting the charge" of agency. Fairchild justifies this proposed burden-shifting rule on the ground that "it is unlikely an opposing party will have access to direct evidence of the parties' relationship."

We reject Fairchild's suggestion. Claim preclusion, like issue preclusion, is an affirmative defense. Ordinarily, it is incumbent on the defendant to plead and prove such a defense. We have never recognized claim preclusion as an exception to that general rule. We believe that direct evidence justifying nonparty preclusion is often in the hands of plaintiffs and defendants. In these situations, targeted interrogatories or deposition questions can reduce information disparity. We see no greater cause here than in other matters of affirmance to disturb the traditional allocation of the proof burden.

Lee v. POW! Entertainment, Inc., 468 F.Supp.3d 1000 (C.D. Cal. 2020)

OTIS D. WRIGHT, II, United States District Judge.

I. INTRODUCTION

Defendant POW! Entertainment, Inc., (“POW”) filed a motion to dismiss the amended complaint filed by Plaintiff Joan Celia Lee (“JC Lee”). POW argues that JC Lee’s amended complaint is barred by the doctrines of res judicata, collateral estoppel, and statute of limitations. For the reasons discussed below, the Court GRANTS POW’s Motion to Dismiss.

II. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

A. Present Lawsuit

JC Lee is the daughter and trustee for the estate of comic book author Stan Lee. Stan Lee is responsible for co-creating comic book characters such as Spider-Man, the X-Men, Iron Man, and many others. POW, a Delaware corporation, claims that Stan Lee assigned to it the rights to his intellectual property.

JC Lee seeks to enforce the terms of an agreement made in 1998 (the “1998 Agreement”) between Stan Lee and Stan Lee Entertainment, Inc. (“SLEI”). Specifically, JC Lee contends that, under the terms of the 1998 Agreement, Stan Lee assigned full and complete title to his name, likeness, and creator rights to SLEI in perpetuity. As such, JC Lee seeks declaratory and injunctive relief that SLEI, owns the rights to Stan Lee’s intellectual property, name, and likeness, and asserts a cause of action against POW for cybersquatting in violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1125(d).

B. Factual Background

After departing from Marvel in August 1998, Stan Lee formed SLEI, to which he allegedly “conveyed clear title to his name, likeness and all creator rights” on October 15, 1998. In January 2001, Stan Lee accused Stan Lee Media, Inc. (“SLMI”), successor-in-interest to SLEI, of being “in complete breach of the salary and benefit provisions, inter alia, of the 1998 Agreement so that he was justified in terminating the agreement.” Subsequently, due to a lack of operating capital caused by a series of unfortunate events, SLMI filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

Following the bankruptcy filing, in 2001, Stan Lee and others formed POW. JC Lee alleges that the other founders of POW manipulated Stan Lee into transferring ownership of his creator rights and rights to his name and likeness “three years after he divested himself of any further legal interest in those rights” to SLMI per the 1998 Agreement.

When Stan Lee died in November 2018, JC Lee, as his only heir and trustee of his estate, became the successor-in-interest of Stan Lee’s alleged obligations relating to the 1998 Agreement. She files suit “to ensure the Lee Trust is able to perform the duties it assumed under Stan Lee’s 1998 Agreement and act in accord with the obligations under the Assignment by obtaining a Declaratory Judgment to the effect all rights, title and interest to Stan Lee’s Name and likeness and Brand, along with copyrights and trademarks now reside with SLEI in association with the Lee Trust.”

C. Prior Litigation

The 1998 Agreement between Stan Lee and SLMI has been the subject of numerous federal court cases throughout the country. See Abadin v. Marvel Entm't, Inc.; Lee v. Marvel Entertainment, Inc.; Stan Lee Media Inc. v. Lee ("SLM I"); Stan Lee Media, Inc. v. Walt Disney Co. ("SLM II"); Enters., Inc. v. Entm't Theatre Grp.

Notably, in 2010, the Southern District of New York held that the 1998 Agreement was breached by Stan Lee in 2001 per his correspondence with SLMI indicating that SLMI breached the and benefit provisions in the agreement. Furthermore, the court held that the limitations to challenge the termination had lapsed by 2010, and that, even if not terminated, the 1998 Agreement had expired in 2005 pursuant to California Labor Code 2855a, which limits the duration of personal services contracts to seven years.

In 2012, Judge Wilson of the Central District of California addressed the 1998 Agreement. In that action, SLMI sued Stan Lee and others alleging that Stan Lee and Marvel were liable on the 1998 Agreement because Stan Lee had "assigned all copyrights and trademarks associated with all characters and comic books that he authored, including the iconic characters created during his tenure at Marvel" to SLMI. The court granted defendants' motion to dismiss on the grounds that SLMI's claims were barred by res judicata. Tellingly, the court noted "that there is a compelling public interest in bringing this matter to a close."

In 2013, the District of Colorado cited the aforementioned cases and similarly held that attempts to enforce the 1998 Agreement were precluded by collateral estoppel.

Despite the numerous failed attempts to enforce the 1998 Agreement, SLMI alleged against Stan Lee's estate and reached a settlement that was adopted by a court, although to provide further details. JC Lee now files this suit to satisfy the estate's obligations under terms of that settlement to "correct the breach of the agreement" and "remedy the various invalid assignments made by Stan Lee." The Court infers that SLMI has entered into a settlement prompting JC Lee to file this suit for declaratory relief, though neither the terms of the settlement nor the judgment have been provided to the Court.

III. MOTION TO DISMISS

B. Res Judicata

POW moves to dismiss all of JC Lee's claims arguing that her claims are barred by res judicata, also known as claim preclusion. Res judicata bars lawsuits based on "any claims that have been or could have been raised in a prior action." Res judicata applies to bar a suit where there is (1) identity of claims; (2) a final judgment on the merits; and (3) identity or privity between the parties.

3. Identity or Privity Between Parties

Third, the parties in the current action must be identical to or in privity with the parties in the prior actions. Abadin was filed by SLMI's shareholders derivatively on behalf of Marvel Entertainment, Inc. and others. In SLMI II, SLMI filed suit against the Stan Lee Corporation and others. In the matter before the Court, JC Lee, in her role as the trustee of Stan Lee's estate, files suit against POW. As the parties are not identical, they must be in privity.

res judicata to apply. “Privity may exist if there is substantial identity between parties, that is, when there is sufficient commonality of interest.” The Ninth Circuit has stated that “privity is a flexible concept dependent on the particular relationship between the parties.” For example, “privity between parties exists when a party is so identified in interest with a party to former litigation that he represents precisely the same right in respect to the subject matter involved.”

Here, JC Lee asserts that she was not a party to the prior suits and argues, without support, that she is not in privity with SLMI. However, she concedes that she has “joined forces” with SLMI and is the successor in interest to Stan Lee, the assignor of SLMI’s rights per the parties to the 1998 Agreement. Indeed, JC Lee alleges that legal title to Stan Lee’s “name and likeness and creator rights” remain with SLMI and files this suit seeking declaratory relief of SLMI’s rights. JC Lee seeks to enforce the same contractual provision as in Abadin and SLMI, making the same argument that by signing the 1998 Agreement, Stan Lee assigned his intellectual property to SLMI, and seeks the same relief. Thus, JC Lee and SLMI are in privity.

Even where parties are in privity, the Court must consider whether the interests of the party absent in the prior action were adequately represented. In Headwaters Inc., the Ninth Circuit considered the notice the nonparty had and the level of protection the district court afforded the nonparty’s interests. Here, JC Lee, a nonparty in Abadin and SLMI, asserts that her interest is to “vindicate and clear title to Stan Lee’s intellectual property” as assigned by the 1998 Agreement. As the prior courts considered this very question and JC Lee is no stranger to this dispute, JC Lee’s interests were adequately represented. Accordingly, the Court finds the third factor satisfied.

As POW has established all three factors, the Court finds that all claims in this matter are barred by res judicata. Accordingly, the Court GRANTS the motion to dismiss. The Court DIMISSES WITH PREJUDICE all claims in the FAC.

2.4 Exceptions

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 26

Exceptions to the General Rule Concerning Splitting

(1) When any of the following circumstances exists, the general rule of §24 does not apply to extinguish the claim, and part or all of the claim subsists as a possible basis for a second action by the plaintiff against the defendant:

- (a) The parties have agreed in terms or in effect that the plaintiff may split his claim, or the defendant has acquiesced therein; or
- (b) The court in the first action has expressly reserved the plaintiff’s right to maintain the second action; or

- (c) The plaintiff was unable to rely on a certain theory of the case or to seek a certain or form of relief in the first action because of the limitations on the subject jurisdiction of the courts or restrictions on their authority to entertain multiple demands for multiple remedies or forms of relief in a single action, and the plaintiff in the second action to rely on that theory or to seek that remedy or form of relief;
- (d) The judgment in the first action was plainly inconsistent with the fair administration of justice, such as the implementation of a statutory or constitutional scheme, or it is the sense of the court that the plaintiff should be permitted to split his claim; or
- (e) For reasons of substantive policy in a case involving a continuing or recurring harm, the plaintiff is given an option to sue once for the total harm, both past and prospective, from time to time for the damages incurred to the date of suit, and chooses the option or
- (f) It is clearly and convincingly shown that the policies favoring preclusion of successive actions are overcome for an extraordinary reason, such as the apparent interest of justice in continuing restraint or condition having a vital relation to personal liberty or the prior litigation to yield a coherent disposition of the controversy.

Passaro v. Virginia, 935 F.3d 243 (4th Cir. 2019)

RICHARDSON, Circuit Judge

Antonio Passaro Jr. is a former Special Agent with the Virginia State Police. He claims he faced unlawful discrimination based on his mental disability (post-traumatic stress disorder) and national origin (Italian-American). He also claims that he was unlawfully fired for filing a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (“EEOC”). In his conduct, he claims, violated the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (“ADA”) and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (“Title VII”). He has sued the Commonwealth of Virginia and the Virginia Department of State Police (together, “the Commonwealth”), seeking relief in the form of compensatory damages, reinstatement, and back pay.

The district court dismissed Passaro’s ADA claim, concluding that it was barred by sovereign immunity. The court then granted summary judgment for the Commonwealth on the Title VII claims, concluding they were barred by the claim-preclusive effect of the EEOC’s final judgment upholding the outcome of an administrative grievance Passaro had filed. The court upheld the district court’s dismissal of the ADA claim because the Commonwealth has no claim against it for damages arising from its exercise of sovereign immunity from that claim. But we reverse the district court’s decision that the preclusion bars Passaro’s Title VII claims.

I.

Passaro worked as a Trooper with the Department of State Police until his promotion to Special Agent. In 2008, he transferred to the department's High Tech Crimes Unit, where he investigated child-pornography cases. Starting in 2010, he began receiving disciplinary notices for infractions arising from his alleged failure to follow proper procedures and to manage his caseload. The episode that ultimately led to Passaro's termination was an investigation he conducted in April and May 2012, which the department claims he bungled.

In July 2012, a doctor diagnosed Passaro with post-traumatic stress disorder arising from his frequent exposure to images of child pornography at work. Passaro sought a transfer from High Tech Crimes, which he claims was not granted.

On February 6, 2013, Passaro learned that he was being recommended for demotion from Special Agent back down to Trooper. Two days later, Passaro filed a complaint with the EEOC, asserting that the department had failed to make reasonable accommodations for his post-traumatic stress disorder and had harassed and discriminated against him based on his disability and national origin.

In March 2013, Passaro was fired. He then filed a grievance with Virginia's Office of Employment Dispute Resolution under Virginia Code § 2.2-3003. He claimed that his discipline and termination were unjustified, and also that he had been the victim of discrimination and harassment. The grievance was assigned to a hearing officer, who promptly held a hearing and issued a decision that largely focused on whether Passaro's discipline comported with internal department policies. Despite overturning some of the disciplinary action against Passaro, the hearing officer upheld Passaro's termination.

Passaro sought review of the hearing officer's ruling. He filed administrative appeals, which were denied. Passaro also appealed to a Virginia state court for review of whether the grievance decision was "contradictory to law" under Virginia Code § 2.2-3006(B). The court largely rejected Passaro's arguments but concluded the hearing officer had overlooked certain testimony. On remand, the hearing officer affirmed his earlier decision, and Passaro again filed administrative appeals that were denied. Passaro returned to state court, which this time affirmed. Passaro then appealed to Virginia's intermediate appellate court, which affirmed. His state-court appeals finally concluded in May 2018, when the Virginia Supreme Court declined Passaro's request for rehearing.

In November 2016, while those appeals were ongoing, Passaro brought the instant action in Virginia state court against the Commonwealth. His complaint asserted "unlawful discrimination, harassment and retaliation," as well as improper denials of his "requests for reasonable accommodations." The Commonwealth timely removed the case to federal district court, asserting federal question jurisdiction based on the Title VII claims.

The Commonwealth then moved to dismiss, and the district court granted the motion in part. It dismissed Passaro's ADA claim, which it concluded was barred by state sovereign immunity. It also dismissed Passaro's Title VII claim for national-origin discrimination but gave him leave to replead. Passaro filed an amended complaint, which the Commonwealth answered, asserting numerous defenses including res judicata. The parties then consented to have the matter proceed before a magistrate judge for all purposes.

Before the magistrate judge, the Commonwealth sought to stay this action pending resolution of Passaro's state-court appeals, arguing that the state-court judgment had preclusive effect on this case. Passaro responded that, while he disagreed that the action would have any preclusive effect, he did not object to a stay. The court granted a stay, which remained in place until May 2018.

After the stay was lifted, the Commonwealth moved for summary judgment, arguing that state-court proceedings had claim-preclusive effect on Passaro's discrimination and retaliation claims under Title VII. The district court agreed and entered judgment for the Commonwealth.

Passaro timely appeals. He argues that the district court erred in dismissing his Title VII claims because the Commonwealth has waived its state sovereign immunity. He also argues that claim preclusion does not bar his Title VII claims, asserting that the Commonwealth also has a defense and, alternatively, that claim preclusion does not apply.

III.

We reverse the district court's ruling at summary judgment that claim preclusion bars Passaro's Title VII claims. State law governs whether a prior state-court judgment has issued preclusive effect on a Title VII action. Under Virginia law, it "is firmly established that the party who asserts the defenses of res judicata or collateral estoppel has the burden of proof to establish that the claim or issue is precluded by a prior judgment." The Commonwealth asserts that Passaro could have litigated his claims of discrimination and retaliation through the state grievance process, meaning that the state-court judge (who affirmed the decision on Passaro's grievance) has claim-preclusive effect barring Passaro's Title VII claims in full. We disagree.

Under Virginia's law of claim preclusion, parties "may not relitigate 'the same cause of action or any part thereof which could have been litigated in the previous action.'" While this is a broad proposition, claim preclusion nonetheless is limited by longstanding principles. In this case, the Commonwealth's claim-preclusion defense runs afoul of one such limitation: procedural rules prevented the plaintiff from asserting all his claims for relief in the first case, then claim preclusion does not bar the plaintiff from bringing a second case to seek relief he could not obtain in the first.

The breadth of claim preclusion has long turned on the plaintiff's ability to seek complete relief in a single action. We see this most clearly in the historical division between law and equity, which often afforded different remedies on the same facts:

So long as law and equity were administered by separate courts, or by different "sides" of the same court, a first proceeding at law or in equity often could be followed by a second proceeding at law or at equity. A party who lost an action at law on a contract, for instance, might undo the law judgment by securing reformation in a subsequent suit in equity. A court of law, on the other hand, might cheerfully grant a damages remedy after denial of an equitable remedy on discretionary grounds. Much similar duplication of litigation occurred.

Even where an equity court could award incidental legal relief, such as damages, claim preclusion often did not bar a later action at law because it was thought unfair to force a litigant to seek damages in equity where he had no right to a jury trial. Thus, a suit in equity generally lacked preclusive effect on a later action at law “unless the very matter in controversy in the pending action was decided in the prior suit.”

These limitations on claim preclusion became outmoded as joinder rules became less restrictive. Today, plaintiffs can usually seek all available relief in a single suit. Reflecting this fact, the modern trend—and the one adopted by the Second Restatement of Judgments—is to expand claim preclusion to cover all claims arising from the same “transaction” underlying the prior action. The Virginia Supreme Court adopted a similar transactional approach in 2006 when it promulgated Rule 1:6, which provides that all claims relating to the “same conduct, transaction or occurrence” fall within the scope of claim preclusion. That holds true “whether or not the legal theory or rights asserted in the second or subsequent action were raised in the prior lawsuit, and regardless of the legal elements or the evidence upon which any claims in the prior proceeding depended, or the particular remedies sought.” The rule provides only one narrow exception relating to certain mechanic’s lien remedies.

Despite Rule 1:6’s sweeping and mostly unqualified language, where joinder remains limited, so does the scope of claim preclusion. Even under Rule 1:6, claim preclusion remains “the stepchild of pleading and joinder rules” and “largely depends on which claims could have been brought” in the earlier action. Indeed, Virginia’s Supreme Court—whose guidance we must faithfully apply in interpreting the rule—has held that “all of the ordinary caveats to res judicata apply to Rule 1:6’s transactional approach.”

One well-recognized caveat is that the transactional approach assumes “no formal barriers in the way of a litigant’s presenting to a court in one action the entire claim including any theories of recovery or demands for relief that might have been available to him under applicable law.” “When such formal barriers in fact existed and were operative against a plaintiff in the first action, it is unfair to preclude him from a second action in which he can present those phases of the claim which he was disabled from presenting in the first.”

Here, Passaro could not have presented his entire case in one action. Virginia’s grievance procedures offer substantive claims that employees cannot pursue in a typical civil action. In particular, the grievance process appears to be the only mechanism by which a Virginia state employee can have disciplinary action overturned for violating internal policies of the state agency that employed him. And a Title VII action offers compensatory damages that are unavailable through the grievance process. Virginia’s administrative grievance procedures forbid damages awards, instead permitting limited monetary remedies such as back pay and, in some cases, attorney’s fees. Title VII affords compensatory damages for intentional discrimination that represent a distinct form of relief from back pay, and encompass distinct harms such as emotional distress. Thus, neither the grievance process nor a Title VII lawsuit offered a single proceeding where Passaro could litigate all his claims for relief.

Nor can we conclude, at least based on the record before us, that Passaro could have brought a Title VII claim for money damages as part of the subsequent state-court action challenging the grievance decision. The statutory procedures governing grievance appeals suggest that such a claim cannot feasibly be joined to a Title VII action seeking damages. There is no provision for joinder, and the deadlines are too rapid to accommodate a typical civil action: the state court must hear the appeal within 30 days of receiving the grievance record and must then decide the case within 60 days of the hearing. And the Commonwealth conceded at oral argument that there is no basis under state law for a claim for damages to the agency-review action.

Because Passaro could not have sought money damages in the prior suit, claim preclusion does not bar him from seeking money damages in this federal action. And he has done nothing to show that his prayer for relief includes a request for compensatory damages up to the statutory maximum. Thus, the Commonwealth did not meet its burden to establish that claim preclusion bars Passaro's claim in full, and we must reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the Commonwealth.

The Commonwealth, like the district court, relies on language in Rule 1:6 stating that claim preclusion applies "regardless of the particular remedies sought" in the prior proceeding. But the Commonwealth's argument misapprehends the meaning of the quoted text. Rule 1:6 provides that a litigant may limit the scope of claim preclusion by choosing to seek only particular remedies in the prior proceeding. Yet there is a critical distinction between the remedies sought and the remedies available. A litigant has no right to split his claim by voluntarily choosing to seek only some of the remedies available to him, but that is not really a choice when it is thrust upon him by procedural rules. Thus, under traditional claim-preclusion principles, a litigant who had to split his claims to preserve his rights may return to court to seek remedies that were unavailable to him in the prior proceeding. Virginia's Supreme Court has made clear that Rule 1:6 preserves this aspect of traditional common law, notwithstanding any recognized limitations on the scope of claim preclusion.

Ultimately, this result is consistent with basic fairness. If claim preclusion applied in this case, a litigant in Passaro's shoes would face a difficult choice. He would either have to放弃 his claims through the grievance proceeding, forgoing his ability to obtain compensation (as well as his right to a jury trial), or rely solely on a traditional civil action, giving up his right to appeal the police department's grievance decision. The common law does not permit such a result, which lets procedural rules deprive a litigant of his substantive rights. Virginia, we conclude, follows the common law in this regard.

That does not necessarily mean giving litigants like Passaro a second bite at the apple. If they raise issues about discrimination and retaliation during the grievance process, and those issues were actually decided, then issue preclusion may bar relitigating them. We do not mean to limit availability or scope of issue preclusion, which is not before us. Moreover, claim preclusion could still conceivably bar Passaro's Title VII action to the extent he seeks remedies (such as reinstatement and back pay) that were available through the grievance process. But the Commonwealth has not advanced that more limited claim-preclusion argument, so we need not address it. We hold merely that claim preclusion does not bar Passaro's Title VII claim in full—that is, even for compensatory damages unavailable in the prior suit—which is why the district court erred in dismissing them on that ground.

3. Issue Preclusion

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 17

Effects of Former Adjudication—General Rules

A valid and final personal judgment is conclusive between the parties, except on appeal or other direct review, to the following extent:

(3) A judgment in favor of either the plaintiff or the defendant is conclusive, in a subsequent action between them on the same or a different claim, with respect to any issue actually litigated and determined if its determination was essential to that judgment (see §27).

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 27

Issue Preclusion—General Rule

When an issue of fact or law is actually litigated and determined by a valid and final judgment, and the determination is essential to the judgment, the determination is conclusive in a subsequent action between the parties, whether on the same or a different claim.

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 28

Exceptions to the General Rule of Issue Preclusion

Although an issue is actually litigated and determined by a valid and final judgment, and the determination is essential to the judgment, relitigation of the issue in a subsequent action between the parties is not precluded in the following circumstances:

- (1) The party against whom preclusion is sought could not, as a matter of law, have obtained review of the judgment in the initial action; or
- (2) The issue is one of law and (a) the two actions involve claims that are substantially unrelated, or (b) a new determination is warranted in order to take account of an intervening change in the applicable legal context or otherwise to avoid inequitable administration of the laws; or
- (3) A new determination of the issue is warranted by differences in the quality or extensiveness of the procedures followed in the two courts or by factors relating to the allocation of jurisdiction between them; or

(4) The party against whom preclusion is sought had a significantly heavier burden of persuasion with respect to the issue in the initial action than in the subsequent action; or the burden has shifted to his adversary; or the adversary has a significantly heavier burden of proof than was required to be met by the party against whom preclusion is sought in the first action; or

(5) There is a clear and convincing need for a new determination of the issue (a) because of the potential adverse impact of the determination on the public interest or the interests of persons not themselves parties in the initial action, (b) because it was not sufficiently foreseen at the time of the initial action that the issue would arise in the context of a subsequent action, or (c) because the party sought to be precluded, as a result of the conduct of his adversary, under special circumstances, did not have an adequate opportunity or incentive to obtain a full adjudication in the initial action.

National Satellite Sports, Inc. v. Eliadis, 253 F.3d 621 (6th Cir. 2001)

RONALD LEE GILMAN, Circuit Judge.

On the night of December 14, 1996, the Melody Lane Lounge, a commercial bar located in Massillon, Ohio, showed the live broadcast of a boxing match between Riddick Bowe and Artur Golota (the event). National Satellite Sports, Inc. (NSS) had obtained the exclusive right to broadcast the event to commercial establishments in Ohio. Time Warner Entertainment Company, L.P. had obtained the exclusive right to broadcast the event on a pay-per-view basis to its Ohio residential customers. The Melody Lane Lounge, erroneously listed as a Time Warner customer of Time Warner, ordered the event through Time Warner's service.

After learning that the Melody Lane Lounge had shown the event to its patrons on a pay-per-view basis, NSS brought suit against Eliadis, Inc., the corporate owner of the bar. NSS also named Eliadis's two owners and Time Warner as defendants. NSS alleged that the Melody Lane Lounge had shown the event in a commercial establishment through Time Warner's residential service, which violated a provision of the Federal Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. §§ 151-613 (Communications Act), which, among other things, prohibits the unauthorized divulgence of wire communications.

Eliadis and its co-owners reached a prompt settlement with NSS. NSS and Time Warner filed cross-motions for summary judgment against each other. The district court granted summary judgment to NSS on the issue of liability, and subsequently entered a final judgment awarding NSS damages, costs, and attorney fees.

Time Warner appeals the district court's rulings, claiming that the court erred in holding that the preclusive effect of an adverse judgment against NSS in prior litigation between them extends to the allegedly controlling issue. We AFFIRM the judgment of the district court.

I. BACKGROUND

A. Factual background

NSS and Time Warner obtained their respective rights to broadcast the event through separate contracts. New Jersey Sports Productions, Inc., d/b/a Main Events (Main Events), produced the event. It granted Pay Per View Networks, Inc., d/b/a Viewer's Choice (Viewer's Choice), the exclusive right to broadcast the event to residential households. Viewer's Choice, in turn, licensed Time Warner to make the telecast of the event available to residential customers in Ohio. Main Events granted Entertainment by J&J, Inc. (EJJ) a separate exclusive right to broadcast the event to commercial establishments. NSS obtained the right to be the commercial distributor of the event's telecast in Ohio from EJJ.

Main Events created a single telecast of the event and sent it to a transmission station. From the transmission station, the signal was sent to two different satellites. Viewer's Choice received the signal from one of the satellites. It decoded the signal, rescrambled it, and sent it to another set of satellites that transmitted the signal to a Time Warner facility in Akron, Ohio. The Akron facility, known as a "head end," receives programs via satellite and distributes them to subscribers in the Akron region. Because the event was a pay-per-view program, Time Warner encrypted it at the Akron head end so that only subscribers who had ordered the event would be able to decode and view the program.

NSS received its transmission of the telecast from a chain of distribution that traces back to the second satellite that received the initial signal from Main Events. As a result, the signals that NSS and Time Warner received in their respective Ohio facilities both originated from the same initial transmission sent by Main Events, and neither party disputes the right of the other to receive the signals in Ohio according to their separate contracts. Rather, the dispute centers on Time Warner allowing a commercial establishment to view the event on its residential-customer cable network.

Melody Lane Lounge's account was listed in the individual name of Gust Eliadis, a co-owner of Eliadis, Inc. In February of 1996, Ken Sovacool, a Time Warner employee, serviced Eliadis's cable account. Time Warner concedes that Sovacool should have recognized that the Melody Lane Lounge was a commercial establishment and not a residence. The structure of the building, an exterior identification sign, and neon beer signs in the window made this obvious. Nevertheless, having obtained residential-cable service, the Melody Lane Lounge had the capability to order pay-per-view programs.

Time Warner's account records show that Melody Lane Lounge had ordered one earlier program at the commercial rate. But Melody Lane Lounge ordered the event in question from Time Warner at the residential rate of $39.95. As a commercial establishment, Melody Lane Lounge should have paid NSS for the right to show the event, which would have cost it $987.50.

NSS hired investigators to visit various commercial establishments to monitor whether the event had obtained the right to do so through NSS as the proper channel. An investigator visited the Melody Lane Lounge on the night in question and determined that it was broadcasting the event through Time Warner's residential system. The Melody Lane Lounge claims that it would not have chosen to show the event if it had been required to pay NSS's high commercial rate. Only 23 patrons were in the bar at the time the event was broadcast.

B. Procedural background and prior litigation between the parties

NSS commenced its action in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio in November of 1997. Eliadis, Inc. and its co-owners soon settled with NSS, agreeing to enter a judgment against them for violating 47 U.S.C. § 605, which is part of the Communications Act of 1934, and paying $250 in nominal damages. NSS's claim against Time Warner proceeded.

In July of 1999, the district court entered summary judgment in favor of NSS, finding that Time Warner had violated § 605. A bench trial on the issue of damages was held several months later. The district court determined that Time Warner was liable for $4,500 in statutory damages. Time Warner further sought and was awarded attorney fees and costs pursuant to 47 U.S.C. § 605(b), totaling $26,389.65, in March of 2000. Time Warner appeals the rulings of the district court, raising three alternative arguments.

First, Time Warner contends that the district court erred by failing to give preclusive effect to a separate district court judgment rendered in July of 1998 that arose from a substantially identical claim by NSS against Time Warner. NSS learned that a commercial establishment in Akron, Ohio called Lyndstalder, Inc., d/b/a Coach's Corner, had shown a boxing match between Evander Holyfield and Bobby Czyz that Coach's Corner obtained via residential satellite from Time Warner in March of 1996. As in the case before us, Time Warner had granted an exclusive right from the producer to distribute the match to residential customers in Ohio. NSS received the exclusive license to sell the same program to Ohio's commercial establishments.

NSS commenced an action against Coach's Corner and its owner in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio in August of 1997. When NSS learned of Time Warner's role in providing the broadcast to Coach's Corner, it added Time Warner as a defendant to the suit, National Satellite Sports, Inc. v. Lyndstalder, Inc. d/b/a/ Coach's Corner, et al., No. 97cv1004 (N.D.Ohio 1998). NSS alleged that both Coach's Corner and Time Warner had violated § 605. Coach's Corner settled with NSS. Time Warner then filed a motion for summary judgment, alleging that NSS had failed to establish either a contractual or a statutory claim against it.

The district court held a hearing on Time Warner's motion for summary judgment in January of 1998. It issued a bench ruling at that hearing, granting Time Warner's motion for summary judgment on the basis that NSS "failed to state a claim pursuant to the terms of the statute or for distribution at issue in this case as well as 47 U.S.C. § 605." NSS did not appeal. Time Warner argues that the Coach's Corner decision precludes NSS from raising the identical § 605 claim in the present case.

II. ANALYSIS

B. NSS is not bound by the decision in Coach's Corner

NSS brought suit in both this case and in the Coach's Corner case under 47 U.S.C. § 605. Section 605 defines what constitutes the unauthorized publication or use of electronic communications. It includes such prohibited practices as the divulgence of wire or radio communications by persons authorized to receive them to others who are not so authorized, and the interception of any radio communication by a person not authorized to receive that communication from the sender. According to § 605, "any person aggrieved by any violation of subsection (a) of this section may bring a civil action in a United States district court or in any other court of competent jurisdiction." Furthermore, the statute directs that "the term 'any person aggrieved' shall include any person with proprietary rights in the intercepted communication by wire or radio, including wholesale or retail distributors of satellite cable programming."

In its motion before the court in Coach's Corner, Time Warner argued that it was entitled to summary judgment because NSS was not a "person aggrieved" within the meaning of § 605(d)(6), and could therefore not pursue a claim for an alleged violation of § 605(a). NSS responded by arguing that standing to sue under § 605 is not limited to those who meet the statutory definition of a "person aggrieved."

The district court granted Time Warner's motion for summary judgment in the Coach's Corner case. In articulating its reasoning from the bench on July 13, 1998, the court held that NSS had failed to state a claim under both the contracts at issue in that case and under 47 U.S.C. § 605. The pertinent parts of the Coach's Corner ruling were as follows:

With regard to the ruling, NSS has failed to state a claim pursuant to the terms of the contracts at issue in this case as well as 47 United States Code Section 605.

Paragraph 14(e) of the Television Licensing Agreement provides for the enforcement of unauthorized display of the closed circuit television feed. That also provides that Joe Hand Promotions the licensor of the event could not assert any piracy claim without prior notice.

The agreement provides that a sublicensee NSS has no rights to enforceability, quote,
"It being understood that your sublicensee shall have no right to commence or settle any claim or litigation hereunder."

The other relevant agreement is the March 12, 1996 Closed Circuit Television Agreement entered into between the licensor and NSS.

That agreement at paragraph 7 provides that there is no right to a piracy action to be pursued by NSS. NSS's effort to overcome the language of the contract does not create a material fact for trial.

Time Warner now argues that the district court below should have given preclusive effect to the earlier ruling in Coach's Corner. It claims that Coach's Corner determined that when a commercial establishment shows a sporting event ordered through a residential-cable service rather than properly paying the fees exacted by the commercial distributor, the distributor does not have standing to sue the authorized residential-service provider under § 605. NSS obviously disagrees.

Our circuit has held that a prior decision shall have preclusive effect on an issue raised in a subsequent case if four elements are met:

- (1) the precise issue raised in the present case must have been raised and actually litigated in the prior proceeding;
- (2) determination of the issue must have been necessary to the outcome of the prior proceeding;
- (3) the prior proceeding must have resulted in a final judgment on the issue;
- (4) the party against whom estoppel is sought must have had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the prior proceeding.

In the present case, the district court concluded that Time Warner had failed to establish all four of these elements. Because Time Warner and NSS disagree about whether these four elements were met, an analysis of each is necessary in order to decide whether the court erred by failing to give preclusive effect to the Coach's Corner decision.

1. Identity of issues

Time Warner argues that the Coach's Corner court was faced with the precise threshold question of whether NSS had standing to sue under § 605; in particular, whether NSS had a proprietary interest in the pay-per-view transmission of the Holyfield/Czyz boxing match at issue in Coach's Corner. Time Warner further contends that the bifurcation of the transmission of the Holyfield/Czyz boxing match at issue in Coach's Corner was identical to the manner in which the event in question was sent to Time Warner and NSS in Ohio on January 14, 1996.

NSS counters that there is no identity of issues in these two cases. First, it contends that the transmissions at issue in Coach's Corner are distinguishable from the ones involved in the present case. Specifically, Time Warner distributed the Holyfield/Czyz boxing match to residential customers through its Home Box Office (HBO) service, not through a pay-per-view network. The difference is that all residential HBO subscribers had access to view the Holyfield/Czyz match, whereas only the residential customers who ordered the Bowe/Holyfield boxing match through the pay-per-view network could view the program. Second, NSS argues that the licensing agreements as between Time Warner and NSS were fundamentally different.

We believe that Time Warner's argument is the more persuasive on this "identity of issues" element. Although HBO and pay-per-view are different subscriber services, the key difference between the two cases is the same — the consequences of a commercial establishment gaining access to a pay-per-view boxing match by being inaccurately listed as a residential customer of Time Warner. Time Warner has satisfied the first element for issue preclusion.

2. Necessary to the outcome of the prior proceeding

The district court held that Time Warner failed to establish that NSS's lack of standing under § 605 was necessary to the grant of summary judgment for Time Warner in Coach's Corner. The court determined that the Coach's Corner decision was instead primarily based on the fact that NSS was contractually barred from pursuing an action against Time Warner because it had agreed to arbitrate disputes with Time Warner.

particular language in the license agreements involved in that case. As such, it held that the alternative ground in Coach's Corner for granting Time Warner's motion for summary judgment — namely, that NSS was not a "person aggrieved" under § 605 — was not necessary to that court's judgment.

Time Warner argues that the district court erred in reaching this conclusion. It notes that Coach's Corner is a case in which two alternative but independent grounds support the court's ultimate judgment. Time Warner claims that under the "weight of federal authority, a plaintiff is precluded from relitigating an issue actually decided against it in a prior case, even if the court in the prior case rested its judgment on alternative grounds." It cites the Second, Seventh, Ninth, and D.C. Circuits as upholding this general principle of issue preclusion.

This principle of issue preclusion, however, is counterbalanced by courts and commentaries that have adopted the opposite conclusion. For example, the American Law Institute (ALI) endorses NSS's position that "if a judgment of a court of first instance is based on determinations of two issues, either of which standing independently would be sufficient to support the result, the judgment is not conclusive with respect to either issue standing alone." Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27 cmt. i (1980). Furthermore, one leading commentary describes the Restatement's view as the "new" and "modern" rule. At least four circuits (the Third, Fourth, Eighth, and Tenth) have adopted this modern rule.

The issue is a close one given the policy implications involved. Time Warner argues that by not recognizing Coach's Corner as precluding relitigation of whether NSS has standing to sue under § 605, NSS is free to relitigate the same issue again. NSS counters by arguing that because the Coach's Corner court decided that NSS was contractually barred from pursuing a claim against Time Warner, NSS had no incentive to appeal that court's secondary decision that NSS failed to state a claim under § 605.

We find NSS's point persuasive because, while it might have won the "battle" over § 605, NSS would almost surely have lost the "war" in being unable to overcome the contractual prohibition on commencing litigation against Time Warner. Furthermore, the district court's oral ruling in Coach's Corner transcribes into only a two-paragraph conclusory statement regarding NSS's claim under § 605, which was far overshadowed by the balance of its three-page discussion outlining the contractual obstacles that prevented NSS from suing Time Warner.

This circuit has not decided whether alternative grounds for a judgment are each "necessary to the outcome" for the purposes of issue preclusion in a subsequent case involving only one of the grounds. Based on the actual decision in Coach's Corner, we do not find it necessary to fully resolve this issue at the present time. We do hold, however, that where, as in Coach's Corner, one ground for the decision is clearly primary and the other only secondary, the secondary ground is not "necessary to the outcome" for the purposes of issue preclusion. Coach's Corner's secondary holding that NSS failed to state a claim under § 605 was thus not necessary to the granting of Time Warner's motion for summary judgment.

3. Final judgment on the merits

Although the district court held that the Coach's Corner decision was a final judgment for the purpose of issue preclusion, NSS argues that it was not. In particular, the court's judgment in Coach's Corner was a dismissal of NSS's suit without prejudice to state a claim. This argument is without merit. Coach's Corner granted Time Warner summary judgment pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The district court made clear that its judgment was final. It recognized that "both parties more than likely have a disagreement over everything I say, pretty much, and you can't tell me that that's not a dispute." Finally, summary judgment is recognized as a final judgment for the purpose of issue preclusion. Time Warner satisfied this third element for issue preclusion.

4. Full and fair opportunity to litigate

Turning to the final element, Time Warner contends that the district court in Coach's Corner granted its motion for summary judgment after full briefing and argument, and that NSS had a sufficient opportunity to litigate the § 605 issue before that court. NSS, however, argues that the district court in Coach's Corner primarily focused on the question of whether the license agreement contractually barred it from initiating a suit against Time Warner. NSS contends that the question of whether NSS had a proprietary right in the community § 605 was secondary. The district court agreed with NSS.

We believe that Time Warner has the more persuasive argument on this issue. Not only did the Coach's Corner case prevent either NSS or Time Warner from raising all potential defenses about the applicability of § 605 to the circumstances of their case. Despite the language that was ultimately held to bar NSS from raising a claim against Time Warner in Coach's Corner, NSS still had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the claim that it raised under § 605. Thus, we conclude that Time Warner has satisfied this final element for issue preclusion.

In sum, we agree with the district court that the second element ("necessary to the cause of action") has not been met, but disagree that the fourth element ("full and fair opportunity to litigate") is lacking. But because all four elements must be satisfied before the prior opinion has issue preclusive effect, NSS is not bound by the decision in Coach's Corner.

In re Nageleisen, 523 B.R. 522 (Bankr. E.D. Ky. 2010)

TRACEY N. WISE, Bankruptcy Judge.

This matter is before the Court on the Bank of Kentucky's motion for judgment on the pleadings. In this adversary proceeding, the Bank of Kentucky (Plaintiff) seeks a declaratory judgment that two tracts of real property in which Debtor claims a one-half interest are part of Debtor's estate, but property of a family partnership in which Debtor is a partner. Plaintiff seeks a determination that a judgment debt, owed to Plaintiff on account of a judgment finding that the Defendants engaged in a series of transactions to defraud creditors, is non-dischargeable. For the reasons set forth below, the Motion will be denied.

Facts and Procedural History

Prior to Debtor's bankruptcy, Debtor was a member of the Nageleisen Family Limited Partnership (the "Partnership"), a partnership organized under Kentucky law and dissolved on February 4, 2013. During the Partnership's existence, the Partnership received various loans from the Bank of Kentucky, none of which were secured by the pieces of property at issue in this adversary proceeding. In 2013, the Partnership transferred title in the real property located at 10324 Decoursey Pike, Ryland Heights, Kentucky, to Debtor and her husband, Alan Nageleisen. Plaintiff then filed suit against Debtor, Alan Nageleisen, and the Partnership in Kenton County Circuit Court, alleging that the transfer of the Decoursey Pike property was a fraudulent conveyance.

On December 15, 2013, Debtor filed her first Chapter 13 petition in this Court, staying the state-court action. On January 16, 2014, Debtor dismissed that Chapter 13 case on the basis of Plaintiff's representation that it would forbear from seeking judgment in the state-court action and attempt to settle with Debtor and her husband. However, on January 31, 2014, according to the Debtor, Plaintiff permitted a default judgment to be entered in its favor in the state-court action.

The state court found that on January 3, 2013, the Partnership conveyed title to the Decoursey Pike property to Debtor's son, without consideration and for the purpose of defrauding Plaintiff. Specifically, the state court found:

The Certification of Consideration on the Deed expressly states that the property was worth $90,000, and that it was being conveyed as an alleged "gift" to Kyle Debtor's son and without consideration; According to the Kenton County PVA, the transfer of 10324 Decoursey from the Family Partnership to Kyle was not an arms-length transaction, because the property was "gifted" to Kyle and was transferred without adequate consideration provided in exchange;

Alan, Barbara, the Family Partnership, and another defendant all engaged in fraud by conveying the real property and improvements located at 10324 Decoursey from the Family Partnership to Kyle without consideration to defraud creditors. Alan, Barbara, the Family Partnership, and another defendant agreed to and did act in concert and participation with one another to transfer the real property and improvements located at 10324 Decoursey Pike to Kyle for the purpose of defrauding BOK;

As a direct and proximate result of the fraudulent transfer and acts of Alan, Barbara, and the Family Partnership, BOK has been damaged in the amount of Ninety Thousand Dollars ($90,000.00), which is the value of the property fraudulently transferred according to the Certification of Consideration completed and filled out by the Defendants, and judgment is hereby entered in favor of BOK and against Alan, Barbara, and the Family Partnership, jointly and severally in the amount of Ninety Thousand Dollars ($90,000.00);

Alan, Barbara, the Family Partnership, and another defendant all violated KRS §§ 378.010 & 378.020 by transferring 10324 Decoursey without consideration and with the intent to defraud BOK.

The state-court default judgment found that after the Partnership transferred the Decoursey Pike property to Debtor's son, the son transferred the Decoursey Pike property back to the Partnership, which then transferred the property to Debtor and her husband. As a result, the judgment provided:

Based upon the Complaint and the record before the Court, it is hereby ORDERED, ADJUDGED and DECREED, that the series of transfers from the Family Partnership to Kyle and then back to the Family Partnership and then from the Family Partnership to Alan and Barbara Nageleisen were fraudulent and violated KRS §§ 378.010; 378.020; 378.060 and 378.070 and that all of the transfers are hereby rescinded. Title to 10324 Decoursey shall forthwith be quieted in the Nageleisen Family Limited Partnership and as against Alan R. Nageleisen, Barbara L. Nageleisen and Kyle Nageleisen, and title to 10324 Decoursey shall forthwith be solely and exclusively in the Nageleisen Family Limited Partnership, free, clear and unencumbered of any and all rights, title or interest of Alan R. Nageleisen, Barbara L. Nageleisen, Kyle Nageleisen, and any other entity claiming thereunder, and that all such interests are hereby terminated.

Accordingly, it quieted title to the Decoursey Pike property in the name of the Partnership. At no time did the Debtor seek to set aside or vacate the January 31, 2014 state-court default judgment.

On June 2, 2014, Debtor filed a Chapter 7 petition. On her schedule of assets, she lists an undivided one-half interest in the Decoursey Pike property. Debtor also lists a one-half interest in a residence located at 11480 Staffordsburg Road, Independence, Kentucky, “legal title held in name of [Debtor] and [Debtor’s spouse] as co-owners in the Nageleisen Family Limited Partnership.” Debtor also lists her interest as partner in the Partnership, which she values at $0.

Thereafter, Plaintiff filed this adversary proceeding, seeking determinations that the Decoursey Pike and Staffordsburg Road properties are not property of Debtor’s estate, and that the judgment debt to Plaintiff is nondischargeable under 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(6). Debtor filed a motion to dismiss the adversary proceeding. After that filing, Plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings.

After the Court took the matter under submission, Plaintiff and the Chapter 7 Trustee filed a joint motion for emergency relief from stay in Debtor’s main bankruptcy case to sell various property, including the two properties in dispute in this adversary proceeding, at a public auction sale scheduled for November 25, 2014. The joint motion provided that proceeds from the sale of those properties would be held in escrow pending further order from this Court after resolution of the adversary proceeding. The Court granted the Trustee’s motion.

Analysis

A. The Decoursey Pike Property

Plaintiff seeks a declaratory judgment determining that the Decoursey Pike property is not property of the estate. Plaintiff contends in its motion on the pleadings that the January 31, 2014 state-court default judgment which quieted title to the Decoursey Pike property in the partnership precludes the Partnership from claiming the Decoursey Pike property as property of the estate.

“In determining whether to accord preclusive effect to a state-court judgment, ‘a court must give to a state-court judgment the same preclusive effect as would be given to a judgment under the law of the State in which the judgment was rendered.’” Kentucky law on preclusion, therefore, controls the preclusive effect this Court accords to the state-court default title judgment.

Kentucky recognizes two kinds of preclusion — claim preclusion (or res judicata) and issue preclusion (or collateral estoppel). “Claim preclusion bars a party from relitigating a previously adjudicated cause of action and entirely bars a new lawsuit on the same cause of action. Issue preclusion bars the parties from relitigating any issue actually litigated and finally decided in an earlier action.” Plaintiff does not state, in its motion, upon which theory of preclusion it relies, but the Court takes Plaintiff to rely on issue preclusion. Plaintiff’s cause of action under § 541 was clearly not “previously adjudicated” by the state court in Plaintiff’s fraudulent conveyance suit. Rather, at most, the state court’s decision on the issue of title to the Decoursey Pike property is preclusive in this § 541 action.

The elements of offensive issue preclusion (that is, issue preclusion asserted by a plaintiff) in Kentucky, as recently recapitulated by the district court, are as follows:

An earlier case only bars subsequent litigation over issues that (1) are the same as the issues now presented, (2) were actually litigated, (3) were actually decided, and (4) were necessary to the prior court’s judgment. Before issue preclusion will stick against a current defendant who lost earlier two further elements must be met: (5) the defendant must have had a “realistically full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue,” and (6) preclusion must be consistent with “principles of justice and fairness.”

In order for Plaintiff to satisfy the first element of issue preclusion — identity of issues — Plaintiff must show that the state court’s decision quieting legal title to the Decoursey Pike property in the Partnership answers whether the estate has any interest in the property under § 541. Plaintiff cannot make that showing, because the property interests encompassed by § 541 are not limited to legal title.

Section 541 states that the bankruptcy estate is comprised of “all legal or equitable interests of the debtor in property as of the commencement of the case.” Possessory interests are among the property interests included. And, as this Court has recently held, the possessory interest in property of a debtor who lacks legal title to that property is property of the estate.

“Possessory interest refers to the right of an individual to occupy a piece of land or possess a piece of property. A person with a possessory interest does not own the property, but the person has some present right to control it such as a lease.” West Legal Dictionary

The state-court judgment, while preclusively quieting legal title to the Decoursey Pike property in the Partnership, did not address any possessory interest that Debtor — whose schedules indicate she resides at the property — may have. Therefore, the issue the state court decided is not identical to the issue of whether the estate has an interest under § 541 in the Decoursey Pike property. Plaintiff is not entitled to judgment on the pleadings on this count.

C. Nondischargeability of the Money Judgment

Finally, Plaintiff seeks a determination that the $90,000 judgment debt created in the state-court action is nondischargeable under § 523(a)(6) of the Code because it is a debt for a willful and malicious injury. Plaintiff contends that the judgment was for Debtor’s intentionally fraudulent conveyance of the Decoursey Pike property, that the state court’s determination that Debtor transferred the Decoursey Pike property with intent to defraud creditors has issue-preclusive effect in this proceeding, and that the state court’s finding that Debtor intended to defraud creditors satisfies the willfulness and malice elements of § 523(a)(6).

Section § 523(a)(6) excepts from discharge “any debt for willful and malicious injury by the debtor to another entity or to the property of another entity.” 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(6). In its motion for judgment on the pleadings on this count of Plaintiff’s complaint, Plaintiff must show it is clearly entitled to judgment on the following questions: (1) that Debtor obtained a debt, (2) that Debtor willfully and maliciously injured Plaintiff or its property, and (3) that the debt owed to Plaintiff is for that willful and malicious injury.

The state-court judgment plainly created a debt in favor of Plaintiff. The parties dispute, however, whether the judgment contains a finding of willful and malicious injury that would have preclusive effect in this adversary proceeding. Plaintiff argues that the state court’s finding that Debtor conveyed the Decoursey Pike property to her son with the intent to defraud Plaintiff, and that the conveyance injured Plaintiff, add up to a finding that Debtor willfully and maliciously injured Plaintiff. Further, Plaintiff argues that these findings of the state court would have preclusive effect. Debtor disputes this.

As reviewed above, issue preclusion under Kentucky law principally requires that the issue which preclusion is sought and the issue addressed in the prior case are the same, that the issue was actually litigated in the prior case, actually decided in the prior case, and necessary to the prior court’s judgment. The requirement that the issue be necessary to the judgment is an obstacle to preclusion in this case.

Plaintiff argues that the state court’s finding of fraudulent intent is tantamount to a finding of willful and malicious injury. Assuming this arguendo, the state court’s finding of fraudulent intent must have been necessary to its judgment. It was not. The state court found that Debtor’s transfer of the Decoursey Pike property to her son was a fraudulent conveyance on theories of constructive fraud. It first found that Debtor conveyed the Decoursey Pike property without consideration in violation of Ky. Rev. Stat. § 378.020, which voids constructively fraudulent transfers. It also found that Debtor conveyed the Decoursey Pike property with the intent to defraud Plaintiff in violation of Ky. Rev. Stat. § 378.010, which voids intentionally fraudulent transfers. The Court found that Plaintiff was damaged by “the fraudulent transfer and acts” of Debtor in the amount of $90,000 — the value of the transferred property — and entered judgment for that amount.

Nothing in the state court’s judgment supports a conclusion that the court’s finding of fraudulent intent was necessary to its money judgment in Plaintiff’s favor. The judgment in Plaintiff’s favor results from the Debtor’s fraudulent transfer of the property. The court’s finding that Debtor conveyed the property without consideration in violation of § 378.020 was sufficient to support the court’s finding that the conveyance was a fraudulent transfer, and thereby support the money judgment. No particular reference to Debtor’s fraudulent intent was made in the court’s money judgment. Further, the damages the court awarded were compensatory, blocking an inference that a finding of bad intent was necessary to the damages.

Though the state court’s alternative finding of fraudulent intent was logically unnecessary to its judgment, not all courts agree on whether alternative findings are necessary to support issue preclusion. Many jurisdictions, following the Second Restatement of Judgments, never treat alternative findings as preclusive. The Second Restatement of Judgments holds that alternative findings may not be as carefully considered as findings solely necessary to the judgment.

judgment, and that losing parties will lack incentive to appeal erroneous alternative findings when a judgment is supported by correct alternative findings, teaches that alternative findings. Other jurisdictions, however, follow the First Restatement of Judgments, which recommended giving preclusive effect to alternative findings, so long as “either alone would have been sufficient to support the judgment.”

While many jurisdictions have adopted one of the all-or-nothing approaches of the Restatements, a number of jurisdictions have attempted to craft hybrid approaches that are sensitive to the concerns animating the Second Restatement’s rule, but that give preclusive effect to alternative findings when those concerns are allayed. The Sixth Circuit, for example, will not give preclusive effect to a federal judgment’s alternative finding if that finding is secondary to an alternative ground that is “clearly primary.” The Second Circuit, while generally following the First Restatement, has held that exceptions from that rule are appropriate where there is a real “concern that an issue not essential to the prior judgment may not have been afforded careful deliberation and analysis.” Wright and Miller “suggest that preclusion should arise from alternative findings only if a second court can determine without extended inquiry that a particular finding reflects a careful process of decision.”

As explained above, the preclusive effect a Kentucky court’s alternative findings receive is a question of Kentucky law. The Kentucky courts have not addressed this question. “As a federal court faced with resolving an undecided question of state law, this Court ‘must make the best prediction, even in the absence of direct state precedent, of what the Kentucky Supreme Court would do if it were confronted with the question.’”

This Court concludes that were it faced with the issue, the Kentucky Supreme Court would at least decline to give preclusive effect to an alternative finding when that finding is conclusory and the court’s other finding is supported by an expressed factual basis. In describing certain findings as “conclusory,” the Court uses the term in its technical sense, to denote “expressing a factual inference without expressing the fundamental facts on which the inference is based.”

First, declining to give preclusive effect to conclusory alternative findings is consistent with Section 27 of the Second Restatement, on which the Kentucky Supreme Court relied in crafting state law on issue preclusion. Second, what can be gleaned from Kentucky cases suggests that Kentucky would not give preclusive effect to a conclusory finding that is alternative to a non-conclusory finding. Kentucky declines to apply issue preclusion offensively where the party to be bound “lacked incentive to litigate in the prior action or appeal an adverse decision.” This will usually be the case of conclusory alternative findings, because a party will lack incentive to litigate or appeal a conclusory finding where an alternative finding is supported by underlying factual findings and is sufficient to support a judgment.

The Court need not predict whether Kentucky would go farther and adopt the Second Restatement’s rule because here, the judgment at issue contains alternative findings, only one of which is conclusory.

The state court's judgment awarding damages for Debtor's fraudulent conveyance relied on two legal theories — constructive fraud and actual fraud. The former rested soundly on the finding that the Decoursey Pike property was "gifted" to Debtor's son without consideration of value, which is required for a finding of a fraudulent transfer under Ky. Rev. Stat. § 378.010. The latter rested on a bare assertion of fraudulent intent, without expressly setting forth the evidence that supported this finding. In the absence of the soundly supported finding of constructive fraud, the state court might have been reluctant to enter, without hearing evidence, a default judgment. However, because the finding of actual fraud was factually supported, further review of the finding of fraudulent intent seemed unnecessary. Likewise, Debtor lacked incentive to appeal the court's finding of fraudulent intent, since the factually supported finding of a constructively fraudulent conveyance was sufficient to support the court's judgment. In these circumstances, it would be both imprudent and imprudent to give the state court's finding of fraudulent intent preclusive effect in a proceeding.

Accordingly, the Court holds that the state court's finding of fraudulent intent was not dispositive of the issue of willful and malicious injury, and that finding will not be given preclusive effect. As a result, it is unnecessary to consider whether other elements of Kentucky law on issue preclusion are met. Plaintiff is not entitled to judgment on the pleadings on the issue of willful and malicious injury, and therefore not entitled to judgment on the pleading of nondischargeability count of its complaint.

Janjua v. Neufeld, 933 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2019)

A. Wallace Tashima, Circuit Judge

In this case we address, as a matter of first impression in our Circuit, the question of whether issue preclusion applies in adjustment of status proceedings. We determine whether an issue was "actually litigated" in a previous adjudication for purposes of issue preclusion, also known as collateral estoppel. We hold that an issue was actually litigated in a prior proceeding only if it was raised, contested, and submitted for determination in the prior adjudication.

Khalil Janjua ("Janjua"), a noncitizen, was granted asylum in the United States. After he was granted asylum, he applied for adjustment of status, which was denied on the ground that he was inadmissible under 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B)(i) for having supported a Tier 1 terrorist organization. To be eligible for asylum, an applicant must not be inadmissible under 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(3)(B). Adjustment of status imposes the same requirements. Janjua thus was found inadmissible under § 1182(a)(3)(B), but because he was granted asylum —and therefore was necessarily not found inadmissible under § 1182(a)(3)(B)(i)—issue preclusion bars the government from now denying his adjustment of status application on that ground. The question of whether Janjua was inadmissible on terrorism-related grounds was not raised, contested, or submitted for determination at Janjua's asylum proceeding. Janjua's argument that the relevant organization, however, was discussed at length. Assuming without deciding that issue preclusion applies in adjustment of status proceedings, the central question is whether the issue of terrorism-related inadmissibility was actually litigated at Janjua's asylum proceeding.

proceeding for purposes of issue preclusion. Because that issue was not raised, contested, or submitted for determination at Janjua's asylum proceeding, it was not actually litigated. Issue preclusion does not bar the government from disputing that issue in Janjua's adjustment of status proceeding. We therefore affirm.

BACKGROUND

I. Factual Background

Janjua is a native and citizen of Pakistan. As a Muhajir [28] living in Pakistan, Janjua joined the Muhamajir Qaumi Movement (“MQM”), a political group. Janjua worked on behalf of the MQM “attending meetings, organizing rallies, distributing flyers,” and advocating for the group’s message during elections. As a result of his affiliation with and work for the MQM, Janjua was arrested and beaten by the police and by members of the opposition party numerous times while in Pakistan. Janjua eventually fled Pakistan in July 1998, entering the United States without inspection in Arizona on January 17, 1999.

[28] (n.d. in opinion) “Muhamajir” refers to those people who are or are descended from Muslim immigrants from India to Pakistan.”

II. Procedural Background

In November 1999, Janjua applied for asylum with the legacy Immigration and Naturalization Service. In January 2000, Janjua’s application was rejected, and the government served Janjua with a Notice to Appear (“NTA”) in removal proceedings, charging him with inadmissibility under 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(6)(A)(i), as an alien present in the United States without having been admitted or paroled. The NTA did not charge him with inadmissibility under any terrorism-related inadmissibility grounds.

Janjua conceded removability, but submitted applications for asylum, withholding of removal, and relief under Article 3 of the Convention Against Torture (“CAT”) predicated on his fear of persecution on the basis of his membership in the MQM. At Janjua’s merits hearing, the immigration judge (“IJ”) admitted into evidence Janjua’s written statement regarding his participation in MQM activities and meetings, and Janjua testified at length about what he did as a member of the MQM and the abuse he suffered as a result of his membership. At one point, the government attorney focused on the MQM’s reputation for violence, noting that “the Country Reports on Pakistan put out by the Department of State for the United States Government suggests that the MQM has demonstrated its willingness to use violence and intimidation to further its objectives” and asking whether Janjua had ever “used violence and intimidation to further the goals of the MQM,” to which Janjua responded, “Never.” Neither Janjua’s written statement nor his oral testimony discussed whether Janjua collected funds or donations on behalf of the MQM, although he did at one point briefly discuss the annual donation his father would make to the MQM. At no point in the hearing was the issue of whether MQM would qualify as a terrorist organization ever raised or discussed. Then, as remains the case today, asylum was prohibited if an applicant was inadmissible for engaging in terrorist activity, which included knowingly providing material support to or soliciting funds on behalf of a designated terrorist organization.

The IJ denied Janjua's applications for asylum, withholding of removal, and protection under the Convention Against Torture ("CAT"), but the Board of Immigration Appeals ("BIA") reversed and remanded on the issue of Janjua's credibility. On remand, the IJ eventually granted Janjua's application for asylum in 2007, without a written opinion. By that time, Congress had expanded terrorist inadmissibility to also cover so-called Tier III terrorist organizations, "groups of individuals, whether organized or not, which engage in, or has a subgroup which engage in, certain terrorist activities."

In December 2008, Janjua filed a Form I-485, applying for adjustment of status to the United States based on his long-term residency pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1159. After waiting years without adjudication of his application, Janjua filed a petition for a writ of mandamus in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, alleging unlawful delay by the government and asking the court to order the United States Citizenship and Immigration Service ("USCIS") to adjudicate his application. USCIS responded by requesting additional evidence from Janjua regarding his activities with MQM, which he provided.

USCIS denied Janjua's application on August 2, 2016, on the ground that he was inadmissible under § 1182(a)(3)(B)(i)(I) because he "afforded material support to" and "solicited material support for" MQM, which qualified as a Tier III terrorist organization. Thus, USCIS concluded that Janjua was inadmissible under § 1182(a)(3)(B)(i)(I)—and therefore barred from receiving a grant of adjustment of status—because he had engaged in terrorist activity by supporting the MQM.

Following this, Janjua amended his complaint to challenge USCIS' denial of his application for adjustment of status. Because the same terrorism-related grounds for inadmissibility that bar asylum seekers from the United States also apply to the adjustment of status proceedings, Janjua argued that issue preclusion prevented the government from raising terrorism-related inadmissibility in the adjustment of status proceedings because it had necessarily concluded that Janjua was not inadmissible on these grounds when it denied him asylum. Janjua moved for summary judgment on the same basis. The government filed a cross-motion for summary judgment, arguing that issue preclusion did not apply to the adjustment application and, even if it did, the issue was not identical, previously decided.

On July 6, 2017, the district court denied Janjua's motion and granted the government's motion for summary judgment. The district court first held that issue preclusion does apply in adjustment of status proceedings governed by the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"). The district court agreed with the government, however, that the elements of issue preclusion were not met here because the issue of terrorism-related inadmissibility had not been "actually litigated" in Janjua's asylum proceedings because it was not raised and contested. Accordingly, the district court granted the government's motion for summary judgment.²⁹ Janjua timely appealed.

DISCUSSION

Issue preclusion, also known as collateral estoppel, "bars the relitigation of issues that have already been finally decided in previous litigation." For issue preclusion to apply, four conditions must be met: "(1) the issue at stake was identical in both proceedings; (2) the issue was actually litigated and decided in the prior proceedings; (3) there was a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the prior proceeding; and (4) the issue was necessary to decide the merits." Here, the central question is whether inadmissibility for supporting a Tier III terrorist organization was actually litigated in the prior adjudication.^[30] Assuming without deciding that issue preclusion applies in immigration adjustment of status proceedings, we hold that Janjua's inadmissibility on terrorism-related grounds was not actually litigated, because the issue was not in fact raised, contested or submitted to the IJ for determination in Janjua's asylum proceeding.

²⁹(n.2 in opinion) The court further explained that the only remaining issue was whether USCIS had acted arbitrarily or capriciously in recognizing the MQM as a Tier III terrorist organization, which Janjua had not contested and therefore waived.

Unlike claim preclusion, also known as res judicata, issue preclusion requires that an issue must have been "actually and necessarily determined by a court of competent jurisdiction" to be conclusive in a subsequent suit. Thus, issue preclusion does not apply to those issues that could have been raised, but were not: "the judgment in the prior action operates as an estoppel, not as to matters which might have been litigated and determined, but 'only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered."

Accordingly, when applying issue preclusion, we have consistently looked to the record of the prior proceeding to determine whether an issue was in fact raised, contested, and submitted for determination. See Oyeniran, 672 F.3d at 804, 806 (explaining that the question of whether petitioner's father was tortured in Nigeria was "actually litigated" because petitioner presented evidence on the issue, the IJ specifically found so, and the government challenged that claim "at every stage of the administrative proceedings"); Disimone v. Browner, 121 F.3d 1262, 1268 (9th Cir. 1997) (explaining that the issue was actually litigated, even though the prior court did not explicitly address it in its decision, because the parties had raised and contested the issue and the district court had necessarily decided the issue by reaching its decision).

Thus, consistent with the Restatement (Second) of Judgments and our sister circuits, we hold that an issue is actually litigated when an issue is raised, contested, and submitted for determination. Under this standard, neither an issue that could have, but was not, asserted (such as an affirmative defense) nor an issue that was raised but admitted was "actually litigated."

Janjua argues, however, that an issue should be considered actually litigated if it was implicitly raised or if the parties had a full and fair opportunity to raise it. But such a standard would conflate the separate requirements that an issue be "actually decided in the prior proceedings" and "necessary to decide the merits." Issues that are necessarily decided include all issues that must have been decided for a judgment to stand—when asylum is granted, the IJ necessarily decides that none of the grounds for inadmissibility that automatically bar relief applies—regardless of whether they were explicitly raised or contested. Even if an issue is not explicitly raised, if it is necessary to the ultimate determination, it is "necessarily decided." But if an issue is actually litigated if it was implicitly raised, the requirement of actually litigated is rendered meaningless.

Further, the standard urged by Janjua—that an issue is actually litigated if it was implicitly raised—would expand the province of issue preclusion and encroach upon the province of claim preclusion. Both claim preclusion and issue preclusion are meant to preserve judicial resources, minimize inconsistent decisions, and prevent superfluous suits. But one of the key distinctions between claim preclusion and issue preclusion is that the former bars relitigation of any and all matters that were or could have been raised at that adjudication, while the latter precludes relitigation of only those issues that were "actually and necessarily determined," i.e., those that were raised, contested, submitted for determination, and determined. The standard urged by Janjua would allow much broader preclusion, including of issues implicitly fact—raised. And precluding an issue that was not actually litigated—i.e., not raised and submitted for determination—does not conserve judicial resources or facilitate the earlier judgment because resources were not expended on the issue in the first extent that Janjua argues that the issue should be foreclosed because it was implicitly have been raised by the government, that is precisely the sort of preclusion reserved preclusion, not issue preclusion.

Janjua also makes the alternative—and ultimately unpersuasive—argument that “actually litigated” so long as there was a “fair opportunity” to litigate the issue precedent clearly lays out “actually litigated” and a “full and fair opportunity” as separate requirements, each of which must be met for issue preclusion to apply. As we have at least once characterized the necessity that a party have had a “full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue as part of the “actually litigated” consideration, we do so; rather, we explained that issue preclusion is “inappropriate where the party had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the merits of an issue.” A full and fair opportunity was (and remains) a necessary condition for issue preclusion, but we never suggested that was sufficient to satisfy the actually litigated requirement. We have since clarified that the full and fair opportunity requirement is a separate step of the issue preclusion analysis than Janjua’s proposed rule because it conflates two distinct elements of the issue preclusion rule.

Having determined that an issue was actually litigated if it was raised, contested, and submitted for determination by the parties, we now turn to the question of whether Janjua’s related inadmissibility was actually litigated here. Neither the question of whether he qualifies as a terrorist organization nor whether Janjua engaged in terrorist activities is inadmissible as a result was raised, contested, or submitted for determination in Janjua’s proceedings.

To be sure, Janjua’s membership in and work for the MQM were discussed at length during the hearing, including whether he had ever used violence or intimidation to further the organization’s goals. Yet, these topics were explored for their relevance to Janjua’s basis for persecution; no one raised, or even hinted at, these topics as potential grounds for inadmissibility under § 1182(a)(3)(B)(i). Neither party ever addressed whether the MQM was a Tier III terrorist group—this category did not exist at the time of the merits hearing. No further argument was presented to the IJ after the statutory amendment. And the government did not address whether Janjua’s support for the MQM would make him inadmissible—indeed, the government argued that it did not make him inadmissible in the same sense for the same reasons. While Janjua’s work for the MQM was addressed in the proceedings, the specific issue of whether he was inadmissible based on that work was not raised, contested, or submitted for determination. It was not actually litigated in Janjua’s proceeding, and issue preclusion does not apply.

Janjua’s reliance on Paulo v. Holder, 669 F.3d 911 (9th Cir. 2011), is misplaced. In that case, the petitioner’s eligibility for INA § 212(c) relief from removal was raised, contested, and submitted for determination in the first proceeding; in the second, the government advanced an argument as to why he was ineligible. Issue preclusion applied because “the fact that the government advanced the same argument against Paulo’s eligibility was not made by the government and not adduced by the petitioner.”

district court does not mean that the issue of Paulo's eligibility for § 212(c) relief was not decided." Here, however, the government's challenge to Janjua's admissibility in the adjustment of status proceeding is not merely a new argument; rather, the issue of terrorism-related inadmissibility was never disputed in the asylum proceeding. Thus, it was not actually litigated and issue preclusion cannot apply.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we hold that an issue is "actually litigated" for purposes of issue preclusion when it is raised, contested by the parties, and submitted for determination in the prior proceeding. Because the issue of whether Janjua was inadmissible on terrorism-related grounds was not raised, contested, and submitted for determination at his asylum proceeding, it was not actually litigated. Issue preclusion does not apply.

3.1 Non-Mutual Issue Preclusion

Rest. (2d) of Judgments § 29

Issue Preclusion in Subsequent Litigation with Others

A party precluded from relitigating an issue with an opposing party, in accordance with §§27 and 28, is also precluded from doing so with another person unless the fact that he lacked full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the first action or other circumstances justify affording him an opportunity to relitigate the issue. The circumstances to which considerations should be given include those enumerated in §28 and also whether:

- (1) Treating the issue as conclusively determined would be incompatible with an applicable scheme of administering the remedies in the actions involved;
2. The forum in the second action affords the party against whom preclusion is asserted procedural opportunities in the presentation and determination of the issue that were not available in the first action and could likely result in the issue being differently determined;
- (3) The person seeking to invoke favorable preclusion, or to avoid unfavorable preclusion, could have effected joinder in the first action between himself and his present adversary;
- (4) The determination relied on as preclusive was itself inconsistent with another determination of the same issue;
- (5) The prior determination may have been affected by relationships among the parties to the first action that are not present in the subsequent action, or apparently was based on a compromise verdict or finding;
- (6) Treating the issue as conclusively determined may complicate determination of issues in the subsequent action or prejudice the interests of another party thereto;

(7) The issue is one of law and treating it as conclusively determined would inadmissibly foreclose opportunity for obtaining reconsideration of the legal rule upon which it was based.

(8) Other compelling circumstances make it appropriate that the party be permitted to relitigate the issue.

Parklane Hosiery v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322 (1979)

Justice Stewart delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents the question whether a party who has had issues of fact adjudicated against it in an equitable action may be collaterally estopped from relitigating the same issues of fact before a jury in a subsequent legal action brought against it by a new party.

The respondent brought this stockholder's class action against the petitioners in the United States District Court. The complaint alleged that the petitioners, Parklane Hosiery Co., Inc., and 13 of its officers, directors, and stockholders, had issued a materially false and misleading proxy statement in connection with a merger. The proxy statement, according to the complaint, had violated §§ 14 (a), 10 (b), and 20 (a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, as well as rules and regulations promulgated by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The respondent sought damages, rescission of the merger, and recovery of costs.

Before this action came to trial, the SEC filed suit against the same defendants in the United States District Court, alleging that the proxy statement that had been issued by Parklane was materially false and misleading in essentially the same respects as those that had been alleged in the respondent's complaint. Injunctive relief was requested. After a 4-day trial, the District Court found that the proxy statement was materially false and misleading in the respects alleged in the SEC's complaint, and entered a declaratory judgment to that effect. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed this judgment.

The respondent in the present case then moved for partial summary judgment against the petitioners, asserting that the petitioners were collaterally estopped from relitigating the issue of whether the proxy statement contained materially false and misleading information, that had been resolved against them in the action brought by the SEC.^[31] The District Court denied the motion on the ground that such an application of collateral estoppel would violate the petitioners' Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed, holding that a party who has had issues of fact determined against him in a full and fair opportunity to litigate in a nonjury trial is collaterally estopped from relitigating a subsequent jury trial of these same issues of fact. The appellate court concluded that "the Seventh Amendment preserves the right to jury trial only with respect to issues of fact which have been fully and fairly adjudicated in a prior proceeding, nothing more. If those issues have been fully and fairly adjudicated in a prior proceeding, nothing more can be done." The respondent argued that "the Seventh Amendment does not require a trial, either with or without a jury." Because of an intercircuit conflict, we granted certiorari.

^{31.} (n.2 in Opinion) A private plaintiff in an action under the proxy statement rules is not entitled to relief simply by demonstrating that the proxy solicitation was materially false and misleading. The plaintiff must also show that he was injured and prove damages. Since the SEC action was limited to a determination of whether the proxy statement contained materially false and misleading information, the respondent conceded that he would still have to prove these other elements of his prima facie case in the private action. The petitioners' right to a jury trial on those remaining issues is not contested.

The threshold question to be considered is whether, quite apart from the right to a jury trial under the Seventh Amendment, the petitioners can be precluded from relitigating facts resolved adversely to them in a prior equitable proceeding with another party under the general law of collateral estoppel. Specifically, we must determine whether a litigant who was not a party to a prior judgment may nevertheless use that judgment "offensively" to prevent a defendant from relitigating issues resolved in the earlier proceeding.^[32]

^{32.} (n.4 in Opinion) In this context, offensive use of collateral estoppel occurs when the plaintiff seeks to foreclose the defendant from litigating an issue the defendant has previously litigated unsuccessfully in an action with another party. Defensive use occurs when a defendant seeks to prevent a plaintiff from asserting a claim the plaintiff has previously litigated unsuccessfully against another defendant.

Collateral estoppel, like the related doctrine of res judicata,^[33] has the dual purpose of protecting litigants from the burden of relitigating an identical issue with the same party or his privy and of promoting judicial economy by preventing needless litigation. Until relatively recently, however, the scope of collateral estoppel was limited by the doctrine of mutuality of parties. Under this mutuality doctrine, neither party could use a prior judgment as an estoppel against the other unless both parties were bound by the judgment. Based on the premise that it is somehow unfair to allow a party to use a prior judgment when he himself would not be so bound,^[34] the mutuality requirement provided a party who had litigated and lost in a previous action an opportunity to relitigate identical issues with new parties.

By failing to recognize the obvious difference in position between a party who has never litigated an issue and one who has fully litigated and lost, the mutuality requirement was criticized almost from its inception. Recognizing the validity of this criticism, the Court in Blonder-Tongue Laboratories, Inc. v. University of Illinois Foundation abandoned the mutuality requirement at least in cases where a patentee seeks to relitigate the validity of a patent after a federal court in a previous lawsuit has already declared it invalid. The "broader question" before the Court, however, was "whether it is any longer tenable to afford a litigant more than one full and fair opportunity for judicial resolution of the same issue." The Court strongly suggested a negative answer to that question:

^{33.} (n.1 in Opinion) Under the doctrine of res judicata, a judgment on the merits in a prior suit bars a second suit involving the same parties or their privies based on the same cause of action. Under the doctrine of collateral estoppel, on the other hand, the second action is upon a different cause of action and the judgment in the prior suit precludes litigation of issues actually litigated and necessary to the outcome of the first action.

^{34.} (n.1 in Opinion) It is a violation of due process for a judgment to be brought on a litigant who was not a party or a privy and therefore has never had an opportunity to be heard.

In any lawsuit where a defendant, because of the mutuality principle, is forced to present a complete defense on the merits to a claim which the plaintiff has fully litigated and lost in a prior action, there is an arguable misallocation of resources. To the extent the defendant in the second suit may not win by asserting, without contradiction, that the plaintiff had fully and fairly, but unsuccessfully, litigated the same claim in the prior suit, the defendant's time and money are diverted from alternative uses—productive or otherwise—to relitigation of a decided issue. And, still assuming that the issue was resolved correctly in the first suit, there is reason to be concerned about the plaintiff's allocation of resources. Permitting repeated litigation of the same issue as long as the supply of unrelated defendants holds out reflects either the aura of the gaming table or 'a lack of discipline and of disinterestedness on the part of the lower courts, hardly a worthy or wise basis for fashioning rules of procedure.' Although neither judges, the parties, nor the adversary system performs perfectly in all cases, the requirement of determining whether the party against whom an estoppel is asserted had a full and fair opportunity to litigate is a most significant safeguard.

The Blonder-Tongue case involved defensive use of collateral estoppel—a plaintiff from asserting a claim that the plaintiff had previously litigated and lost against defendant. The present case, by contrast, involves offensive use of collateral estoppel. The plaintiff is seeking to estop a defendant from relitigating the issues which the defendant litigated and lost against another plaintiff. In both the offensive and defensive use situations, the party against whom estoppel is asserted has litigated and lost in an earlier action. Several reasons have been advanced why the two situations should be treated differently.

First, offensive use of collateral estoppel does not promote judicial economy in the same way as defensive use does. Defensive use of collateral estoppel precludes a plaintiff from relitigating identical issues by merely “switching adversaries.” Thus defensive collateral estoppel gives the plaintiff a strong incentive to join all potential defendants in the first action if possible. Offensive use of collateral estoppel, on the other hand, creates precisely the opposite incentive. The plaintiff will be able to rely on a previous judgment against a defendant but will not be bound by that judgment if the defendant wins, the plaintiff has every incentive to adopt a “wait-and-see” attitude, in the hope that the first action by another plaintiff will result in a favorable judgment. Thus offensive use of collateral estoppel will likely increase rather than decrease the amount of litigation, since potential plaintiffs will have everything to gain and nothing to lose by not intervening in the first action.

A second argument against offensive use of collateral estoppel is that it may be unfair to the defendant. If a defendant in the first action is sued for small or nominal damages, there is little incentive to defend vigorously, particularly if future suits are not foreseeable. Moreover, offensive collateral estoppel may also be unfair to a defendant if the judgment relied upon as a basis for the estoppel is itself inconsistent with one or more previous judgments against the defendant.^[35] Still another situation where it might be unfair to apply offensive collateral estoppel is where the second action affords the defendant procedural opportunities unavailable in the first action that could readily cause a different result.^[36]

We have concluded that the preferable approach for dealing with these problems is not to preclude the use of offensive collateral estoppel, but to grant trial judges discretion to determine when it should be applied. The general rule should be that where a plaintiff could easily have joined in the earlier action or where, either for the reasons discussed above or for other reasons, the application of offensive estoppel would be unfair to the defendant, a trial judge should not allow the use of offensive collateral estoppel.

In the present case, however, none of the circumstances that might justify reluctance to apply the offensive use of collateral estoppel is present. The application of offensive collateral estoppel will not here reward a private plaintiff who could have joined in the previous action, since the respondent probably could not have joined in the injunctive action brought by the SEC if he so desired. Similarly, there is no unfairness to the petitioners in applying offensive collateral estoppel in this case. First, in light of the serious allegations made in the SEC's complaint, the petitioners, as well as the foreseeability of subsequent private suits that typically follow a successful Government judgment, the petitioners had every incentive to litigate the ^{35.} (n.14 in Opinion) In Professor Currie's familiar example, a railroad collision injures 50 passengers all of whom bring separate actions against the railroad. After the railroad wins the first 25 suits, a plaintiff wins in suit 26. Professor Currie argues that offensive use of collateral estoppel should not be applied so as to allow plaintiffs 27 through 50 automatically to recover.

^{36.} (n.15 in Opinion) If, for example, the defendant in the first action was forced to defend in an inconvenient forum and therefore was unable to engage in full scale discovery or call witnesses, application of offensive collateral estoppel may be unwarranted. Indeed, differences in available procedures may sometimes justify not allowing a prior judgment to have estoppel effect in a subsequent action even between the same parties, or where defensive estoppel is asserted against a plaintiff who has litigated and lost. The problem of unfairness is particularly acute in cases of offensive estoppel, however, because the defendant against whom estoppel is asserted typically will not have chosen the forum in the first action.

fully and vigorously. Second, the judgment in the SEC action was not inconsistent with any previous decision. Finally, there will in the respondent's action be no procedural opportunities available to the petitioners that were unavailable in the first action of a kind that might be likely to cause a different result.

We conclude, therefore, that none of the considerations that would justify a refusal to allow the use of offensive collateral estoppel is present in this case. Since the petitioners received a "full and fair" opportunity to litigate their claims in the SEC action, the contemporary law of collateral estoppel leads inescapably to the conclusion that the petitioners are collaterally estopped from relitigating the question of whether the proxy statement was materially false and misleading.

4. Review Questions

Peggy is fired from her job at the Sterling Cooper advertising agency (located in the State of Hudson). Her boss, Don told her the reason for her firing was poor performance, but Peggy believes the real reason was her refusal to have an affair with Don, who made repeated and unwelcome advances.

Peggy sues Sterling Cooper in Hudson state court, asserting a claim for wrongful discharge. Sterling Cooper moves to dismiss on the grounds that Hudson law does not recognize a claim for wrongful discharge, except where the plaintiff was employed under a contract requiring cause for termination. The court, finding that complaint did not allege that Peggy had such an employment contract, granted the motion to dismiss with prejudice.

Peggy then brings another suit, this time in Hudson federal court, against both Sterling Cooper and Don, asserting claims for employment discrimination under Title VII (a federal statute). In her new complaint, Peggy alleges that she was fired because she rejected Don's unwanted sexual advances. In the federal suit, Peggy seeks damages for emotional distress, punitive damages, and attorney fees (as permitted under Title VII).

Does claim preclusion apply to the claim against Sterling Cooper? To the claim against Don?

Sterling Cooper recently gained a new client, Elke Corp., which manufactures a line of gardening and lawn care equipment. To celebrate, the agency holds an office party, at which several employees, including Ken and Lois, consume excessive quantities of liquor. Ken urges Lois to take an Elke riding lawn mower for a spin around the office. Lois passes out and loses control of the mower, driving it into another Sterling Cooper employee, Guy, whose foot is severed into mulch-sized bits by the mower's blades. Trudy, a guest at the party, is splattered with bits of flesh from Guy's foot, and is terribly distraught. The mower finally comes to a stop after collides into a wall. Lois is thrown from the mower, breaking her leg in the fall.

Under Hudson state law, a claim by an employee for injuries sustained in the course of employment as a result of a fellow employee's negligence is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the state Workers' Compensation Claims Board. The workers' compensation statute bars a claim by the employee against the employer or fellow employees for negligence, except for claims against third parties who may be responsible (in whole or in part) for the employee's injuries. Claimants before the Board may recover actual damages to compensate for the cost of medical treatment for their injuries, but may not recover damages for emotional distress or punitive damages. Proceedings before the Board are relatively informal; there is no discovery process, and the Board may consider evidence that would not be admissible under the Hudson Rules of Evidence.

Guy brings a workers' compensation claim for the injury to his foot. Sterling Cooper resists the claim against the workers' compensation claim on two grounds:

- Guy negligently failed to move out of the way from the approaching mower.
- The accident was the fault of Elke, which designed the mower without an adequate safety feature that would have prevented operation by an unconscious driver, and failed to warn against operating the mower while intoxicated.

The Workers' Compensation Claims Board makes the following findings of fact & conclusions of law:

- Guy was injured while attending a work-related function at Sterling Cooper's office.
- The proximate cause of Guy's injury was the operation of a riding mower in the office by an醉酒的 Sterling Cooper employee, who was intoxicated.
- Guy could not have anticipated that Lois would drive the mower over his foot, and could not have moved out of the way in time to avoid the accident.
- While an injured employee's contributory negligence may provide an employer with a defense under the worker's compensation statute, Guy was not negligent in connection with the accident.
- The mower was not defective in its design.
- The mower did not include any warning against operation indoors or while intoxicated.
- As a matter of law, neither a design defect nor the absence of a warning against unsafe operation of the mower indoors or while intoxicated were responsible for his injury.

Based on these findings, the Board granted Guy's claim. Sterling Cooper appeals the Board's decision to the Hudson Court of Appeals, which affirms the Board's ruling. Under New York law, when a decision by the Board has been affirmed on appeal, the Board's decision has the same preclusive effect as a court judgment.

Guy then files a lawsuit in Hudson federal court against Elke Corp. (which has jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship), alleging that a design defect and lack of a warning against use of the mower indoors or while intoxicated were responsible for his injury.

May Elke rely on the decision of the Workers' Compensation Claims Board to preclude Guy from asserting that the mower's design was defective?

May Guy rely on the decision of the Workers' Compensation Claims Board to preclude Elke from disputing that there was no warning against operating the mower indoors or while intoxicated?

Chapter 8

Summary Judgment

1. Standard for Summary Judgment

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 56

(a) Motion for Summary Judgment or Partial Summary Judgment. A party may move for summary judgment, identifying each claim or defense — or the part of each claim or defense — on which summary judgment is sought. The court shall grant summary judgment if the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. The court should state on the record the reasons for granting or denying the motion.

(g) Failing to Grant All the Requested Relief. If the court does not grant all the relief requested by the motion, it may enter an order stating any material fact — including an item of damages or other relief — that is not genuinely in dispute and treating the fact as established in the case.

Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007)

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

We consider whether a law enforcement official can, consistent with the Fourth Amendment, attempt to stop a fleeing motorist from continuing his public-endangering flight by ramming the motorist's car from behind. Put another way: Can an officer take actions that place a fleeing motorist at risk of serious injury or death in order to stop the motorist's flight from endangering the lives of innocent bystanders?

I

In March 2001, a Georgia county deputy clocked respondent's vehicle traveling at 73 miles per hour on a road with a 55-mile-per-hour speed limit. The deputy activated his blue flashing lights indicating that respondent should pull over. Instead, respondent sped away, initiating a chase down what is in most portions a two-lane road, at speeds exceeding 85 miles per hour. The deputy radioed his dispatch to report that he was pursuing a fleeing vehicle, and broadcast its license plate number. Petitioner, Deputy Timothy Scott, heard the radio communication and joined the pursuit along with other officers. In the midst of the chase, respondent pulled into the parking lot of a shopping center and was nearly boxed in by the various police vehicles. Respondent evaded the trap by making a sharp turn, colliding with Scott's police car, exiting the parking lot, and speeding off once again down a two-lane highway.

Following respondent's shopping center maneuvering, which resulted in slight damage to a police car, Scott took over as the lead pursuit vehicle. Six minutes and nearly 10 miles into the chase had begun, Scott decided to attempt to terminate the episode by employing a Police Impact Intervention Technique ('PIT') maneuver, which causes the fleeing vehicle to stop. Having radioed his supervisor for permission, Scott was told to "go ahead and take care of him." Instead, Scott applied his push bumper to the rear of respondent's vehicle. As a result, respondent lost control of his vehicle, which left the roadway, ran down an embankment, overturned, and crashed. Respondent was badly injured and was rendered a quadriplegic.

Respondent filed suit against Deputy Scott and others under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging a violation of his federal constitutional rights, viz. use of excessive force resulting in unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment. In response, Scott filed a motion for summary judgment based on an assertion of qualified immunity. The District Court denied the motion, finding that "there are material issues of fact on which the issue of qualified immunity turns which present sufficient disagreement to require submission to a jury." On appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the District Court's decision to allow respondent's Fourth Amendment claim against Scott to proceed to trial. After reviewing the record and respondent's view of the facts as given, the Court of Appeals concluded that Scott's use of force did not constitute "deadly force" under Tennessee v. Garner, and that the use of such force in this case "would violate respondent's constitutional right to be free from excessive force during arrests and seizures."

Accordingly, a reasonable jury could find that Scott violated respondent's Fourth Amendment rights. The Court of Appeals further concluded that "the law as it existed at the time of the incident, was sufficiently clear to give reasonable law enforcement officers 'fair notice' that ramming a vehicle under these circumstances was unlawful." The Court of Appeals also concluded that Scott was not entitled to qualified immunity. We granted certiorari to review the Court of Appeals' decision to reverse.

II

In resolving questions of qualified immunity, courts are required to resolve two questions sequentially. The first question is: Taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, do the facts show that the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right? This must be the initial inquiry, and only if the court finds a violation of a constitutional right, "the next, sequential inquiry is whether the right was clearly established in light of the specific context of the case." We turn to the threshold inquiry: whether Deputy Scott's actions violated the Fourth Amendment.

The first step in assessing the constitutionality of Scott's actions is to determine the relevant facts. As this case was decided on summary judgment, there have not yet been factual findings by a judge or jury, and respondent's version of events (unsurprisingly) differs substantially from Scott's version. When things are in such a posture, courts are required to view the facts and draw reasonable inferences "in the light most favorable to the party opposing the summary judgment motion." In qualified immunity cases, this usually means adopting (as the Court of Appeals did here) the plaintiff's version of the facts.

There is, however, an added wrinkle in this case: existence in the record of a videotape capturing the events in question. There are no allegations or indications that this videotape was doctored or altered in any way, nor any contention that what it depicts differs from what actually happened. The videotape quite clearly contradicts the version of the story told by respondent and adopted by the Court of Appeals. For example, the Court of Appeals adopted respondent's assertions that, during the chase, "there was little, if any, actual threat to pedestrians or other motorists, as the roads were mostly empty and respondent remained in control of his vehicle." Indeed, reading the lower court's opinion, one gets the impression that respondent, rather than fleeing from police, was attempting to pass his driving test:

Taking the facts from the non-movant's viewpoint, respondent remained in control of his vehicle, slowed for turns and intersections, and typically used his indicators for turns. He did not run any motorists off the road. Nor was he a threat to pedestrians in the shopping center parking lot, which was free from pedestrian and vehicular traffic as the center was closed. Significantly, by the time the parties were back on the highway and Scott rammed respondent, the motorway had been cleared of motorists and pedestrians allegedly because of police blockades of the nearby intersections.

The videotape tells quite a different story. There we see respondent's vehicle racing down narrow, two-lane roads in the dead of night at speeds that are shockingly fast. We see it swerve around more than a dozen other cars, cross the double-yellow line, and force cars traveling in both directions to their respective shoulders to avoid being hit. We see it run multiple red lights and travel for considerable periods of time in the occasional center left-turn-only lane, chased by numerous police cars forced to engage in the same hazardous maneuvers just to keep up. Far from being the cautious and controlled driver the lower court depicts, what we see on the video more closely resembles a Hollywood-style car chase of the most frightening sort, placing police officers and innocent bystanders alike at great risk of serious injury.

At the summary judgment stage, facts must be viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party only if there is a "genuine" dispute as to those facts. Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 56(c). As we have emphasized, "when the moving party has carried its burden under Rule 56(c), its opponent must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. Where the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for the nonmoving party, there is no 'genuine issue for trial.'" Matsushita Elec. Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp. "The mere existence of some alleged factual dispute between the parties will not defeat an otherwise properly supported motion for summary judgment; the requirement is that there be no genuine issue of material fact." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc. When opposing parties tell two different stories, one of which is blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it, a court should not adopt that version of the facts for purposes of ruling on a motion for summary judgment.

That was the case here with regard to the factual issue whether respondent was driven in a reckless manner so as to endanger human life. Respondent's version of events is so utterly devoid of credibility that no reasonable jury could have believed him. The Court of Appeals erred in failing to instruct the jury that they could not have relied on such visible fiction; it should have viewed the facts in the light depicted in the videotape.

Judging the matter on that basis, we think it is quite clear that Deputy Scott did violate respondent's rights under the Fourth Amendment. Scott does not contest that his decision to terminate the chase by ramming his bumper into respondent's vehicle constituted a "seizure." The question is whether the answer is whether Scott's actions were objectively reasonable.

In determining the reasonableness of the manner in which a seizure is effected, a court must balance the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment rights against the importance of the governmental interests alleged to justify the intrusion. Scott defends his actions by pointing to the paramount governmental interest in ensuring public safety, and respondent nowhere suggests this was not the purpose motivating Scott in this instance. Thus, in judging whether Scott's actions were reasonable, we must consider the potential for public harm that Scott's actions posed to respondent in light of the threat to the public that respondent was trying to eliminate. Although there is no obvious way to quantify the risks on either side, it is clear from the videotape that respondent posed an actual and imminent threat to the safety of any pedestrians who might have been present, to other civilian motorists, and to the police officers involved in the chase. It is equally clear that Scott's actions posed a high likelihood of causing injury or death to respondent—though not the near certainty of death posed by, say, shooting a fleeing felon in the back of the head, or pulling alongside a fleeing motorist's car at 60 miles per hour. So how does a court go about weighing the perhaps lesser probability of killing respondent against the perhaps larger probability of injuring or killing a bystander or another person? We think it appropriate in this process to take into account not only the number of people at risk, but also their relative culpability. It was respondent, after all, who intentionally put himself and the public in danger by unlawfully engaging in the reckless, high-speed chase that ultimately produced the choice between two evils that Scott confronted. Multiple police cars, with blue lights flashing and sirens blaring, had been chasing respondent for nearly half an hour, but he ignored their warning to stop. By contrast, those who might have been harmed if Scott had not taken the action he did were entirely innocent. We have little difficulty in concluding that it was reasonable for Scott to take the action that he did.

But wait, says respondent: Couldn't the innocent public equally have been protected if the tragic accident entirely avoided, if the police had simply ceased their pursuit? We think not. The police need not have taken that chance and hoped for the best. Whereas Scott's action of driving respondent off the road—was certain to eliminate the risk that respondent posed to the public by ceasing pursuit was not. First of all, there would have been no way to convey to respondent via his rear-view mirror and seen the police cars deactivate their flashing lights and turn off their sirens.

would have had no idea whether they were truly letting him get away, or simply devising a new strategy for capture. Perhaps the police knew a shortcut he didn't know, and would reappear down the road to intercept him; or perhaps they were setting up a roadblock in his path. Given such uncertainty, respondent might have been just as likely to respond by continuing to drive recklessly as by slowing down and wiping his brow.

Second, we are loath to lay down a rule requiring the police to allow fleeing suspects to get away whenever they drive so recklessly that they put other people's lives in danger. It is obvious the perverse incentives such a rule would create: Every fleeing motorist would know that escape is within his grasp, if only he accelerates to 90 miles per hour, crosses the double-yellow line a few times, and runs a few red lights. The Constitution assuredly does not impose this invitation to impunity-earned-by-recklessness. Instead, we lay down a more sensible rule: A police officer's attempt to terminate a dangerous high-speed car chase that threatens the lives of innocent bystanders does not violate the Fourth Amendment, even when it places the fleeing motorist at risk of serious injury or death.

The car chase that respondent initiated in this case posed a substantial and immediate risk of serious physical injury to others; no reasonable jury could conclude otherwise. Scott's attempt to terminate the chase by forcing respondent off the road was reasonable, and Scott is entitled to summary judgment. The Court of Appeals' judgment to the contrary is reversed.

Justice STEVENS, dissenting.

Today, the Court asks whether an officer may "take actions that place a fleeing motorist at risk of serious injury or death in order to stop the motorist's flight from endangering the lives of innocent bystanders." Depending on the circumstances, the answer may be an obvious "yes," an obvious "no," or sufficiently doubtful that the question of the reasonableness of the officer's actions should be decided by a jury, after a review of the degree of danger and the alternatives available to the officer. A high-speed chase in a desert in Nevada is, after all, quite different from one that travels through the heart of Las Vegas.

Relying on a de novo review of a videotape of a portion of a nighttime chase on a lightly traveled road in Georgia where no pedestrians or other "bystanders" were present, buttressed by uninformed speculation about the possible consequences of discontinuing the chase, eight of the jurors on this Court reach a verdict that differs from the views of the judges on both the District Court and the Court of Appeals who are surely more familiar with the hazards of driving on Georgia roads than we are. The Court's justification for this unprecedented departure from our well-settled standard of review of factual determinations made by a district court and affirmed by a court of appeals is based on its mistaken view that the Court of Appeals' description of the facts was "blatantly contradicted by the record" and that respondent's version of the events was "so utterly discredited by the record that no reasonable jury could have believed him."

Rather than supporting the conclusion that what we see on the video “resembles style car chase of the most frightening sort,” the tape actually confirms, rather than the lower courts’ appraisal of the factual questions at issue. More importantly, it su provide a principled basis for depriving the respondent of his right to have a jury question whether the police officers’ decision to use deadly force to bring the chase reasonable.

Omitted from the Court’s description of the initial speeding violation is the fact that was on a four-lane portion of Highway 34 when the officer clocked his speed at hour and initiated the chase. More significantly—and contrary to the Court’s ass respondent’s vehicle “forced cars traveling in both directions to their respective avoid being hit”—a fact unmentioned in the text of the opinion explains why those over prior to being passed by respondent. The sirens and flashing lights on the following respondent gave the same warning that a speeding ambulance or fire e have provided. The 13 cars that respondent passed on his side of the road before shopping center, and both of the cars that he passed on the right after leaving t doubt had already pulled to the side of the road or were driving along the shou they heard the police sirens or saw the flashing lights before respondent or the p approached. A jury could certainly conclude that those motorists were exposed risk than persons who take the same action in response to a speeding ambulance, a reactions were fully consistent with the evidence that respondent, though speed full control of his vehicle.

The police sirens also minimized any risk that may have arisen from running lights.” In fact, respondent and his pursuers went through only two intersections w and in both cases all other vehicles in sight were stationary, presumably because t warned of the approaching speeders. Incidentally, the videos do show that the lig when the police cars passed through them but, because the cameras were farther respondent did so and it is difficult to discern the color of the signal at that point, it i clear that he ran either or both of the red lights. In any event, the risk of harm to t vehicles was minimized by the sirens, and there is no reason to believe that respo have disobeyed the signals if he were not being pursued.

My colleagues on the jury saw respondent “swerve around more than a dozen other force cars traveling in both directions to their respective shoulders,” but they discounted the possibility that those cars were already out of the pursuit’s path hearing the sirens. Even if that were not so, passing a slower vehicle on a two-lane involves some degree of swerving and is not especially dangerous if there are no from the opposite direction. At no point during the chase did respondent pull into lane other than to pass a car in front of him; he did the latter no more than five times of those occasions, used his turn signal. On none of these occasions was there a ca the opposite direction. In fact, at one point, when respondent found himself behind own lane and there were cars traveling in the other direction, he slowed and waited traveling in the other direction to pass before overtaking the car in front of him wi turn signal to do so. This is hardly the stuff of Hollywood. To the contrary, the vi reveal any incidents that could even be remotely characterized as “close calls.”

In sum, the factual statements by the Court of Appeals quoted by the Court were entirely accurate. That court did not describe respondent as a “cautious” driver as my colleagues imply, but it did correctly conclude that there is no evidence that he ever lost control of his vehicle. That court also correctly pointed out that the incident in the shopping center parking lot did not create any risk to pedestrians or other vehicles because the chase occurred just before 11 p.m. on a weekday night and the center was closed. It is apparent from the record (including the videotape) that local police had blocked off intersections to keep respondent from entering residential neighborhoods and possibly endangering other motorists. I would add that the videos also show that no pedestrians, parked cars, sidewalks, or residences were visible at any time during the chase. The only “innocent bystanders” who were placed “at great risk of serious injury,” were the drivers who either pulled off the road in response to the sirens or passed respondent in the opposite direction when he was driving on his side of the road.

I recognize, of course, that even though respondent’s original speeding violation on a four-lane highway was rather ordinary, his refusal to stop and subsequent flight was a serious offense that merited severe punishment. It was not, however, a capital offense, or even an offense that justified the use of deadly force rather than an abandonment of the chase. The Court’s concern about the “imminent threat to the lives of any pedestrians who might have been present,” while surely valid in an appropriate case, should be discounted in a case involving a nighttime chase in an area where no pedestrians were present.

What would have happened if the police had decided to abandon the chase? We now know that they could have apprehended respondent later because they had his license plate number. Even if that were not true, and even if he would have escaped any punishment at all, the use of deadly force in this case was no more appropriate than the use of a deadly weapon against a fleeing felon in Tennessee v. Garner. In any event, any uncertainty about the result of abandoning the pursuit has not prevented the Court from basing its conclusions on its own factual assumptions. The Court attempts to avoid the conclusion that deadly force was unnecessary by speculating that if the officers had let him go, respondent might have been “just as likely” to continue to drive recklessly as to slow down and wipe his brow. That speculation is unconvincing as a matter of common sense and improper as a matter of law. Our duty to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party would foreclose such speculation if the Court had not used its observation of the video as an excuse for replacing the rule of law with its ad hoc judgment. There is no evidentiary basis for an assumption that dangers caused by flight from a police pursuit will continue after the pursuit ends. Indeed, rules adopted by countless police departments throughout the country are based on a judgment that differs from the Court’s. See, e.g., App. to Brief for Georgia Association of Chiefs of Police, Inc., as Amicus Curiae (“During a pursuit, the need to apprehend the suspect should always outweigh the level of danger created by the pursuit. When the immediate danger to the public created by the pursuit is greater than the immediate or potential danger to the public should the suspect remain at large, then the pursuit should be discontinued or terminated. Pursuits should usually be discontinued when the violator’s identity has been established to the point that later apprehension can be accomplished without danger to the public”).

Although Garner may not, as the Court suggests, “establish a magical on/off switch” or rigid preconditions for the use of deadly force, it did set a threshold under which deadly force would be considered constitutionally unreasonable:

Where the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious harm, either to the officer or to others, it is not constitutionally unreasonable to prevent or control that threat by using deadly force. Thus, if the suspect threatens the officer with a weapon or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape, and if feasible, some warning has been given.

Whether a person’s actions have risen to a level warranting deadly force is a question reserved for a jury. Here, the Court has usurped the jury’s factfinding function and implicitly labeled the four other judges to review the case unreasonable. It chastises the Court of Appeals for failing to “view the facts in the light depicted by the videotape” and claims no reasonable person could view the videotape and come to the conclusion that the use of deadly force was unjustified. However, the three judges on the Court of Appeals panel apparently viewed the videotapes entered into evidence and described a very different version of events:

At the time of the ramming, apart from speeding and running two red lights, Harris was driving in a non-aggressive fashion (i.e., without trying to ram or run into the officers). Moreover, Scott’s account of the chase indicates that the road ahead of him on the open highway was largely clear. The videos introduced into evidence show little to no evidence of (or pedestrian) traffic, allegedly because of the late hour and the police blockade of the intersections. Finally, Scott issued absolutely no warning (e.g., over the loudspeaker or otherwise) prior to using deadly force.

If two groups of judges can disagree so vehemently about the nature of the pursuit and the circumstances surrounding that pursuit, it seems eminently likely that a reasonable jury could also disagree with this Court’s characterization of events. Moreover, under the standard set forth in Garner, it is certainly possible that “a jury could conclude that Scott unreasonably used deadly force to seize Harris by ramming him off the road under the instant circumstances.”

The Court today sets forth a per se rule that presumes its own version of the facts. The Court’s opinion states that “the officer’s attempt to terminate a dangerous high-speed car chase that threatened the lives of innocent bystanders does not violate the Fourth Amendment, even when it places the motorist at risk of serious injury or death.” (emphasis added). Not only does that rule ignore the well-established, flexible, and case-by-case “reasonableness” approach applied in Garner and McGinnis v. Connor, but it is also arguably inapplicable to the case at hand, given that it is not clear that the officer had probable cause to believe that the suspect threatened the life of any “innocent bystander.” In my view, the risks of ramming a vehicle in order to stop a speeding vehicle are particularly when less drastic measures—in this case, the use of stop sticks or a similar device issued from a loudspeaker—could have avoided such a tragic result. In my judgment, Georgia should be allowed to evaluate the reasonableness of the decision to ram a speeding vehicle in a manner that created an obvious risk of death and has in fact resulted in a quadriplegic at the age of 19.

2. Burden of Production

Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 56

(c) Procedures.

(1) Supporting Factual Positions. A party asserting that a fact cannot be or is genuinely disputed must support the assertion by:

(A) citing to particular parts of materials in the record, including depositions, documents, electronically stored information, affidavits or declarations, stipulations (including those made for purposes of the motion only), admissions, interrogatory answers, or other materials; or

(B) showing that the materials cited do not establish the absence or presence of a genuine dispute, or that an adverse party cannot produce admissible evidence to support the fact.

(2) Objection That a Fact Is Not Supported by Admissible Evidence. A party may object that the material cited to support or dispute a fact cannot be presented in a form that would be admissible in evidence.

(3) Materials Not Cited. The court need consider only the cited materials, but it may consider other materials in the record.

(4) Affidavits or Declarations. An affidavit or declaration used to support or oppose a motion must be made on personal knowledge, set out facts that would be admissible in evidence, and show that the affiant or declarant is competent to testify on the matters stated.

(d) When Facts Are Unavailable to the Nonmovant. If a nonmovant shows by affidavit or declaration that, for specified reasons, it cannot present facts essential to justify its opposition, the court may:

(1) defer considering the motion or deny it;

(2) allow time to obtain affidavits or declarations or to take discovery; or

(3) issue any other appropriate order.

(e) Failing to Properly Support or Address a Fact. If a party fails to properly support an assertion of fact or fails to properly address another party's assertion of fact as required by Rule 56(c), the court may:

(1) give an opportunity to properly support or address the fact;

(2) consider the fact undisputed for purposes of the motion;

- (3) grant summary judgment if the motion and supporting materials — including those considered undisputed — show that the movant is entitled to it; or
- (4) issue any other appropriate order.

"Materials in the Record": Discovery

Rule 56(c) requires that "A party asserting that a fact cannot be or is genuinely disputed must support by citing to particular parts of materials in the record" or "showing that the materials cited do not establish the absence or presence of a genuine dispute, or that an adverse party cannot produce admissible evidence to prove the fact." The "materials in the record" are produced in the discovery process, governed by FRCP Rule 26.

Under Rule 26(a), the parties have a duty to disclose certain information pertaining to their claims and defenses.

(1) Initial Disclosure.

(A) In General. Except as exempted by Rule 26(a)(1)(B) or as otherwise stipulated or ordered by the court, a party must, without awaiting a discovery request, provide to the other parties: must disclose certain information "without awaiting a discovery request":

(i) the name and, if known, the address and telephone number of each individual likely to have discoverable information—along with the subjects of that information—that the disclosing party may use to support its claims or defenses, unless the use would be solely for impeachment;

(ii) a copy—or a description by category and location—of all documents, electronically stored information, and tangible things that the disclosing party has in its possession, custody, or control and may use to support its claims or defenses, unless the use would be solely for impeachment;

(iii) a computation of each category of damages claimed by the disclosing party—who must also make available for inspection and copying as under Rule 34 the documents or other evidentiary material, unless privileged or protected from disclosure, on which each computation is based, including materials bearing on the nature and extent of injuries suffered; and

(iv) for inspection and copying as under Rule 34, any insurance agreement under which a insurance business may be liable to satisfy all or part of a possible judgment in the action or to indemnify or reimburse for payments made to satisfy the judgment.

(2) Disclosure of Expert Testimony.

(A) In General. In addition to the disclosures required by Rule 26(a)(1), a party must disclose to other parties the identity of any witness it may use at trial to present evidence under Federal Rule of Evidence 702, 703, or 705.

(3) Pretrial Disclosures.

(A) In General. In addition to the disclosures required by Rule 26(a)(1) and (2), a party must provide to other parties and promptly file the following information about the evidence that it may present at trial, other than solely for impeachment:

- (i) the name and, if not previously provided, the address and telephone number of each witness—separately identifying those the party expects to present and those it may call if the need arises;
- (ii) the designation of those witnesses whose testimony the party expects to present by deposition and, if not taken stenographically, a transcript of the pertinent parts of the deposition; and
- (iii) an identification of each document or other exhibit, including summaries of other evidence—separately identifying those items the party expects to offer and those it may offer if the need arises.

The parties may also seek information through the discovery process. Rule 26(b)(1) defines the scope of discovery:

Unless otherwise limited by court order, the scope of discovery is as follows: Parties may obtain discovery regarding any nonprivileged matter that is relevant to any party's claim or defense and proportional to the needs of the case, considering the importance of the issues at stake in the action, the amount in controversy, the parties' relative access to relevant information, the parties' resources, the importance of the discovery in resolving the issues, and whether the burden or expense of the proposed discovery outweighs its likely benefit. Information within this scope of discovery need not be admissible in evidence to be discoverable.

Rule 26(b) also sets certain limits on discovery and governs the timing of requests.

The discovery methods authorized under the FRCP include depositions (i.e. examination and cross-examination of parties and other potential witnesses) (Rules 30-32); interrogatories (i.e. written questions directed to a party) (Rule 33); requests for production of documents or things (Rule 34); physical and mental examinations (Rule 35); and requests for admission (Rule 36).

The record may also include stipulations by the parties, i.e. agreements as to certain facts. The parties may stipulate to facts provisionally, for the purpose of summary judgment only, while reserving the right to contest the facts at trial if the court does not grant summary judgment.

Stout v. Vincent, 717 Fed. Appx. 468 (5th Cir. 2018)

Per Curiam

We decide whether the district court erred when granting summary judgment in favor of a police officer on the racial profiling claims of a black couple. The district court found that the couple failed to raise any genuine issue of material fact showing that the officer violated their equal protection rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. We affirm.

Facts and Proceedings

Cathryn Scott Stout and Raymond Montgomery, Jr., who are black, were travelling together from Memphis, Tennessee in a Lexus sport utility vehicle ("SUV") on Interstate 55 through central Mississippi. Montgomery noticed Mississippi Highway Safety Patrol ("MHSP") cars parked on the median. Soon after they passed the cars, Trooper Patrick Wall drove up along the side of their SUV in the left lane and looked at them. He then dropped behind their vehicle and turned on his lights and siren. Montgomery, who was driving, pulled over, but he did not feel nervous because he was not speeding and he believed he had done nothing wrong.

Trooper Wall asked Montgomery to step out of the car to show him that the SUV's license plate was partially obscured by a tag holder. The tag holder bore the logo and colors of the Alpha Sorority, Inc. ("AKA"), a black sorority to which Stout belonged. Trooper Wall informed Montgomery that the MHSP was attempting to "crack down" on drivers with tags that obscured their plates. Trooper Wall said he would not issue a ticket for the obscured license plate, but he asked for Montgomery's license and permission to search the vehicle. Montgomery consented to the search.

Trooper Wall called Staff Sergeant Vincent for backup, informing him that Stout and Montgomery were "argumentative and difficult to deal with." When Officer Vincent arrived, Trooper Wall told him that Montgomery exhibited unusual signs of nervousness and anxiety. The two passengers had offered conflicting stories about where they were traveling, the purpose of the trip, and how long they intended to stay in Mississippi. Officer Vincent questioned both passengers himself. Stout informed Officer Vincent that she was in the state to perform research for her doctoral degree at Saint Louis University. But Officer Vincent had trouble recalling this fact once litigation had commenced. He remembered only that one of the passengers explained that they were traveling to a concert.^[37]

Officer Vincent informed Stout and Montgomery that troopers can run the license plates of individuals in a car to check their criminal histories and ensure that they are not wanted for arrest. He further explained that the Mississippi Department of Public Safety uses traffic infractions as a pretext to stop for criminal investigations. He said, "The more people we pull over, the more people we check out, the more likely we are to catch somebody up to no good."

Trooper Wall ran a check on Montgomery's Tennessee driver's license. The computer system showed that he had prior arrests for both possession of narcotics and intent to distribute them. Officer Vincent's training and many years of experience in drug interdiction made him aware that Interstate 55 is used often to transport drugs, particularly between Jackson, Mississippi, and Memphis, Tennessee. Officer Vincent requested permission to search the vehicle, which was denied.

Officer Vincent called for a K-9 officer, and Deputy Joseph Mangino soon arrived on the scene. Officer Vincent instructed Montgomery and Stout to turn off their car, get out of the vehicle, and stand away from each other and the car while the dog sniffed around the SUV. Once the dog picked up a "suspicious" scent from inside the vehicle, the officers searched the car. The inspection was thorough, and more than an hour passed from the initiation of the search until the officers finally allowed Appellants to leave without issuing a citation.

Stout and Montgomery sued Officer Vincent, seeking injunctive relief and damages for violation of their Fourteenth Amendment rights under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Specifically, they argued that impermissible considerations of race motivated their extended detention by Officer Vincent. Officer Vincent moved for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, and the district court granted his motion, concluding Appellants "have not presented any evidence in support of their claim that Officer Vincent's conduct "was at least partially based on race." Stout and Montgomery appealed.

Discussion

^{37.}(n.1 in opinion) Officer Vincent remembered that the passengers gave him conflicting answers as to the purpose and length of their stay in Mississippi. Montgomery and Stout deny that they gave conflicting answers to these questions. Because of the procedural posture, we view all factual disputes in a light most favorable to Appellants.

^{38.}(n.2 in opinion) Officer Vincent told Montgomery and Stout that the dog would sit and freeze if it detected drugs. They never saw the dog sit and freeze. Stout began recording the beginning of the inspection on her phone's camera. Vincent ordered her to put the camera away, and she complied. The limited footage she obtained does not show the dog barking or making any other signals to the troopers.

^{39.}(n.3 in opinion) The parties' accounts of the search differ. Stout and Montgomery insist that no drugs were found in the vehicle. Officer Vincent claims he found marijuana residue on the floorboard of the vehicle and a piece large enough to be easily identified as marijuana. Because the quantity of the marijuana was small, the officers did not issue a citation. We reiterate that we view all factual disputes in a light most favorable to Appellants.

On appeal, Stout and Montgomery raise only one issue: whether the district court erred when concluding there was no genuine issue of material fact that Officer Vincent's actions were impermissibly motivated by race.

I. Legal Standard

A. Summary Judgment

Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56, a “court shall grant summary judgment if the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.” FED. R. CIV. P. 56(a). The Supreme Court has explained that “a party seeking summary judgment always bears the initial responsibility of informing the district court of the basis for its motion, and identifying those portions of the record which it believes demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact.” Celotex Corp. v. Catrett. But the moving party has no need to negate its opponents’ claims.

If the moving party meets its burden, “the nonmovant must go beyond the pleadings and designate specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.” The nonmovant’s “burden is not satisfied with some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts, by conclusory allegations, by unsubstantiated assertions, or by only a scintilla of evidence.”

A court must view all evidence “in the light most favorable to the opposing party.” In Tolan v. Cotton, the Supreme Court stressed “the importance of drawing inferences in favor of the nonmovant” in qualified immunity cases. If a district court credits evidence of the party seeking summary judgment but fails to properly acknowledge key evidence offered by the nonmoving party, it misapprehends the summary judgment standard.

C. Fourteenth Amendment Racial Profiling

“The Constitution prohibits selective enforcement of the law based on considerations such as race.” “The constitutional basis for objecting to intentionally discriminatory application of laws is the Equal Protection Clause.”

Claims of racially selective law enforcement “draw on ordinary equal protection standards.” “To state a claim of racial discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause and section 1983, the plaintiff must allege and prove that she received treatment different from that received by similarly situated individuals and that the unequal treatment stemmed from a discriminatory intent.”

In another context, we have said that a plaintiff’s “subjective belief of discrimination, however genuine, cannot be the basis of judicial relief.” Thus, a plaintiff’s “subjective belief that he was discriminated against, standing alone, is not adequate evidence to survive a motion for summary judgment.”

Finally, “discriminatory intent of one official may not be imputed to another for purposes of imposing individual liability under the civil rights laws.”

II. Lack of Evidence of Fourteenth Amendment Violation

The district court concluded that Montgomery and Stout “have not presented any evidence to support their claim” that Officer Vincent’s decision to detain them was “at least partially based on their race.” The district court further concluded that Montgomery and Stout “I have not shown that their race played any role whatsoever in Vincent’s formulation of his decision.” Montgomery have failed to produce any material evidence showing that race motivated Vincent’s conduct, we need not address the issue. suspicion or wrongdoing, or in the manner in which they were taken by him to dispel that suspicion.”

On appeal, Montgomery and Stout detail the evidence they claim demonstrates Officer Vincent’s discriminatory intent and unequal treatment:

- They were traveling from Memphis, Tennessee to Jackson, Mississippi, where both cities are predominantly black cities.
- They are both black.
- They were driving a Lexus SUV.
- Stout believed “they were being held because they are African American and driving a Lexus.”
- Montgomery also believed “it appeared that the only reason Officer Vincent was holding them was that they were black and driving a Lexus.”
- Officer Vincent later remembered that Stout and Montgomery had indicated that the purpose of their trip to Mississippi was a concert when in fact they had told him that they were going to Mississippi for Stout’s graduate student research. According to Stout and Montgomery, this lapse is evidence that Officer Vincent had discriminatory intent because “he saw two Black people in a nice car and thought they were going to a concert.”
- No trooper issued them a ticket or citation, even though the officers claimed they had marijuana in the SUV.
- They both stated there was no marijuana in the car that day.
- On the day before Officer Vincent detained Appellants, the City of Mound Bayou, Mississippi passed a resolution against the racial profiling of people of color by the MHSP. The City of Winstonville also condemned racial profiling of black people by the MHSP. Officer Vincent has been with the MHSP since 1997.

In light of this evidence, Montgomery and Stout argue that the district court made an error in applying the summary judgment standard when it concluded that they failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact. They stress that, after the Supreme Court’s decision in Tolan, this evidence must be viewed as a whole, and not in individual pieces. And the evidence must be viewed in the most favorable to them.

The Supreme Court's decision in Tolan, however, does not relieve a nonmoving party of its burden to "go beyond the pleadings and designate specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial" after a moving party meets its "initial responsibility." Nor does it allow nonmovants to satisfy their burden with metaphysical doubt, conclusory allegations, unsubstantiated assertions, or a scintilla of evidence.

We have no reason to doubt the genuineness of Montgomery and Stout's subjective belief that Officer Vincent detained them only because they are black. But we cannot accept such evidence as a basis for providing judicial relief. Because we are not permitted to impute any alleged discriminatory intent of Trooper Wall to Officer Vincent for the purpose of imposing individual liability under § 1983, we cannot consider any evidence of racial profiling that occurred before Officer Vincent arrived on the scene. Moreover, we cannot attribute the general evidence of racial profiling by the MHSP condemned by the mayor of Winstonville and the City of Mound Bayou to Officer Vincent.

With this evidence removed, all that remains of Appellants' case is that they, a black couple, were detained when driving a nice car on a Mississippi road by an officer who did not write them a ticket and who could not remember their purpose for visiting the state. Even when viewed as a whole, this evidence fails to show that there is a genuine issue for trial regarding whether Officer Vincent treated them unequally and acted with discriminatory intent.

Although Appellants dispute Trooper Wall's report that they were acting nervous and that they gave conflicting accounts as to the purpose of their trip in Mississippi, this does not create a fact issue because Officer Vincent was allowed to rely on the information provided to him by a fellow officer. In light of the report he received from Trooper Wall, the fact that Montgomery had previously been arrested for distributing narcotics, and the fact that Interstate 55 is often used to transport drugs, Officer Vincent had nondiscriminatory reasons to continue detaining Appellants after the initial stop and request assistance from the K-9 officer.

Because Appellants failed to provide any evidence that Officer Vincent acted with discriminatory intent or treated them unequally, they cannot show there are any genuine issues of fact warranting a trial on their Fourteenth Amendment claim of racial profiling. Accordingly, we conclude the district court did not err when it granted summary judgment in favor of Officer Vincent.

3. Review Question

Sally Schlimazel (domiciled in Florida), was injured when she cut her foot on a chair at the home of her neighbor, Freddie Frankel. The chair was designed by Mebelmacher Designs (incorporated and having its principal place of business in NC). Schlimazel sued Mebelmacher in the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina, asserting a claim under state law based on strict liability for a defective product. (Assume the court has diversity jurisdiction.)

The evidentiary record based on discovery includes the following evidence:

Summary Sally Schlimazel Deposition Testimony

Schlimazel testified in her deposition that she cut her bare foot on the “outside bottom edge of the chair where the base meets the sides,” resulting in severe lacerations. She later examined the chair and determined that the edge was “razor sharp, sharp enough that if you ran your finger across the bottom outside edge of the chair, you would shave skin off your finger.” She further stated that the chrome base of the chair was flush with the plywood base, but the edge was sharp all the way around the base.

Schlimazel went to the emergency room, where a doctor found that Schlimazel had ruptured a tendon in her right foot. Following the doctor’s advice, Schlimazel underwent surgery, followed by six months of physical therapy.

Summary of Freddie Frankel Affidavit

Schlimazel submitted a sworn affidavit from her neighbor, Freddie Frankel. Frankel stated in his affidavit that he bought the chair at a Miami furniture store a few years before the incident. He stated that he never noticed the sharp edge on the chair, and as far as he knew, nobody had ever been injured by it before.

Summary of Milo Mebelmacher Deposition Testimony

Milo Mebelmacher, founder and president of Mebelmacher Designs, testified in his deposition that he designed the Swivel Tub Chair. Mebelmacher licensed the design to Hahn, Inc., the exclusive licensed manufacturer of the chairs.

The chair consists of a “tub” seat attached to a plywood base in a manner that permits the tub to tilt and swivel. A chrome veneer, about one-sixteenth of an inch thick, is affixed to the top of the base. The diameter of the base is about two inches less than the diameter of the tub. The bottom of the tub is about three inches off the floor.

Mebelmacher Deposition, Exhibit A

Tub Chair

The chair was designed for residential use. Mebelmacher assumes that people commonly walk barefoot in their homes. Nonetheless, he never anticipated that someone might put their foot in the area between the tub seat and the top of the base.

He was familiar with the use of clear plastic pieces known as “edge guards.” These are used to protect the bottom edge of the metal on chrome-trimmed furniture. The Swivel Tub Chair was not designed with an edge guard because it did not seem necessary. Although it was technically feasible, it would have ruined the look of the chair to add a wood or cloth trim around the edge of the chrome veneer.

If the chair were manufactured with the chrome veneer extending beyond the plywood, it would create a surface that would cut bare skin. This would be a dangerous condition. The Swivel Tub Chair was specifically designed so that the plywood and chrome would be flush. This was not noted on the design drawing because it is so obvious. The drawings do not include all details: “I don’t put in all the screws, I don’t put in the dowels, I don’t put in the mechanisms. I don’t specify things that are not my problems. These are done by the engineers in the plant.”

A designer’s role is to make a conceptual sketch, to provide a full-sized detail and working sketch, and to supervise the making of a model. The purpose of the supervision is to assure that the finished product looks right. The designer’s responsibilities are “aesthetic and not engineering.” The manufacturer’s inspectors occasionally “let something go through that isn’t exactly right.” In all factories some quality problems get through. Other than the present action, Mebelmacher has not received a single complaint of injury involving any of its furniture designs.

Summary of Julius Hahn Deposition Testimony

Julius Hahn, founder and president of Hahn, Inc., testified that his company manufactures the Swivel Tub Chair at its High Point, North Carolina factory. Hahn distributes the chair to retailers around the country, including the Miami store where Mr. Frankel bought it. Hahn was allegedly responsible for Schlimazel's injury.

Mebelmacher generally furnishes Hahn with a pencil sketch of the furniture design, a working sketch giving the actual dimensions of the piece and specifying the materials to be used. The Swivel Tub Chair was designed so that the chrome veneer edge would be sanded down to fit with the plywood and the edges of the veneer would be sanded down. Chrome veneer is thin because it is thin. However, the chair was not designed to have sharp edges. Hahn does not consider a sharp edge to be a manufacturing defect, not a design defect. Nothing prevented the manufacturer from adding a protective trim along the bottom of the Swivel Tub Chair. Plastic edge guards have been added to similar chairs in the last few years.

Under the applicable state law, the elements of Schlimazel's claim is as follows:

- The defendant designed the product;
- The product's design rendered it unreasonably dangerous in its normal intended use;
- The defective design was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries.

Also under the applicable law, the defendant in a product liability suit based on an alleged design defect may assert, as an affirmative defense, that the dangerous condition of the product resulted from the manufacturing process, not the design itself.

After discovery has concluded, Mebelmacher moves for summary judgment, arguing that Schlimazel has failed to meet her burden of proof that her injury was caused by a defect in the chair, and that any defect in the chair resulted from the manufacturing process, not the design.

Should the court grant summary judgment in favor of Mebelmacher?
